EXPLORATIONS IN EGYPT

The Egyptian Research Account (Society), founded in 1894, has a committee of forty eminent scholars and other public men. PROF. FLINDERS PETRIE, as field director, devotes his entire time to the work. Yearly discoveries relating to the pre-dynastic age, the history, arts, sciences of Egypt, are published in annual quarto volumes, profusely illustrated. Subscribers of but $5 to a season's explorations receive the volume for that year. All interested in Old Egypt should write for the circulars of the Society, freely sent on application, to its official representative, REV. DR. WILLIAM COPLEY WINSLOW, 525 Beacon Street, Boston.

Winthrop's fascinating romance of travel remains our most vital picture of conditions in Washington and Oregon during the territorial period, sixty years ago. The value of his book, for all who are interested in Western history and adventure, has been doubled by the addition of his letters and diaries. These cover his entire stay on the Pacific Coast, beginning at San Francisco, early in 1853, and closing with his overland trip East via Salt Lake City in October.

IMPORTANT FALL BOOKS

MOFFAT, YARD AND COMPANY

THE WALLET OF TIME

Personal, Biographical, and Critical Reminiscence of the American Theatre, 1791-1912

By WILLIAM WINTER

About 1,400 pages. Two volumes, boxed. Price, $10.00 net. Postage, 50 cents extra.

A Special Edition only, strictly limited to 1,250 copies. Printed on pure rag paper, made for this edition. Beautifully illustrated.

To read this work is to read the personal as well as professional history of many of the greatest players who have appeared on the American stage. Personal recollections and theatrical history. Managers and management, plays and dramatists are discussed and depicted, as well as actors and acting.

A truly sumptuous work in two large volumes, containing upwards of 1,300 pages, handsomely illustrated, representing the best in American literature. There is no lover of the theatre in this country—the greatest theatre-going country in the world—whether it be college professor, dramatic critic, actor, or clergyman—man or woman—who can afford to be unfamiliar with the contents of this monumental work.

THE PANAMA CANAL

By EARLE HARRISON

Size 7¼x11½. $1.00 net. Postage, 8 cents.

Illustrated in full color by color photography from the original autochrome photographs by Mr. Harrison. These sixteen pictures of the Panama Canal, taken direct by the author, and printed under his supervision, are the most beautiful ever issued on this subject. These pictures appeared in the July number of Scribner's Magazine.

THE SPIDER'S WEB

By REGINALD WRIGHT KAUFFMAN

Author of "The House of Bondage," etc. Illustrated by Jean Paleologue. 12mo. $1.35 net. Postage, 12 cents.

A story in every way equal to "The House of Bondage," which was a masterpiece of narrative. This new story is written in the best manner of the author, and while the story is the important thing, the incidental causes that go to support the tale throughout are matters of great moment to all Americans.

LOUIS XI AND CHARLES THE BOLD

By Lieut.-Col. ANDREW C. P. HAGGARD, D. S. O.

Large 8vo, gilt top. Illustrated. Price, $4.00 net. Postage, 18 cents.

Colonel Haggard needs no introduction, and the story of the cruel and treacherous son of Charles VII. of France, told in his inimitable style, makes fascinating reading.

SOCIAL SANITY

By SCOTT NEARING

12mo. Cloth, $1.25 net. Postage, 12 cents.

A timely and able book by a writer well known for his writing on Sociological and Economic Questions. In his book Professor Nearing treats of certain influences and problems of the greatest importance to our present-day civilization.

THE NEW DAWN

By AGNES C. LAUT

Illustrated by Jean Palcologue. 12mo. $1.35 net. Postage, 12 cents.

We are always sure of a good story from Miss Laut, and the present story is about the biggest thing she has ever done. There is a vastness in conception and a concentration and strength in the narrative that are remarkable.

THE MEMOIRS OF MIMOSA

Edited by ANNE ELLIOT

12mo. Illustrated Jacket. $1.25 net. Postage, 10 cents.

The intimate confession of a brilliant yet undisciplined woman, who resolves "to live every moment of her life," and succeeds in doing so. One of the most delightful books of the year.

THE CUR AND THE COYOTE

By EDWARD PEPLE

Author of "A Night Out," "The Prince Chap." Illustrated by R. L. Goldberg. 50 cents net. Postage, 5 cents.

The thousands of readers who have so often laughed over "A Night Out" will gladly welcome this new story by the same author.

Lord Lyons A Record of British Diplomacy

By the Right Hon. LORD NEWTON. With Portraits. 2 Vols. 8vo. $8.50 net (Postage 38 cents).

Lord Lyons was the British representative at Washington during the period of the Civil War; subsequently he was Ambassador at Constantinople for two years; and finally he spent twenty years—from 1867 to 1887—as Ambassador at Paris.

Recollections of a Peninsular Veteran

By the late Lt.-Colonel JOSEPH ANDERSON, C.B., Knight of Hanover, of the 78th, 24th and 50th Regiments (1805-1848). With Photogravure Portrait. 8vo. Pp. xvi+299. $3.00 net (Postage 15 cents).

His career was almost continuously as adventurous as it was distinguished. After retiring from the Service, he settled down in Australia, where these memories were compiled. They are written in a simple, unaffected style, and form a record of the manners and customs, of the mode of warfare, and of the military and social life of a bygone generation.

Painting in East and West

By ROBERT DOUGLAS NORTON, Author of "The Choice." Cr. 8vo. Pp. x+301. $1.40 net (Postage 11 cents).

The art of painting, which in the days of Gothic church-building contributed so much both to the education and the pleasure of the community at large, has admittedly come to appeal to ever-narrowing circles, until to-day it cannot be said to play any part in popular life at all. This book seeks to discover the causes of its decline in influence.

William Augustus, Duke of Cumberland: His Early Life and Times, 1721-1748

By the Hon. EVAN CHARTERIS. With Plans and Illustrations. 8vo. $3.50 net (Postage 17 cents).

ARTIFICIAL PARTHENOGENESIS AND FERTILIZATION

By JACQUES LOEB, Member of the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research.

This new work presents the first complete treatment of the subject of artificial parthenogenesis in English. It gives an account of the various methods by which unfertilized eggs can be caused to develop by physicochemical means, and the conclusions which can be drawn from them concerning the mechanism by which the spermatozoon induces development. Since the problem of fertilization is intimately connected with many different problems of physiology and pathology—we need only mention the natural death of the egg cell and the prolongation of its life by fertilization; the fertilization of the egg by foreign blood and the immunity of the egg to blood of its own species; the relations between heterogeneous hybridization and artificial parthenogenesis, between fertilization and cytolysis, and between permeability and physiological efficiency of acids and bases, etc.—the bearing of the facts recorded and discussed in the book goes beyond the special problem indicated by the title.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 13, 1913.

The Week

Mr. Asquith's references to the Mexican embroilment, in his Guildhall speech Monday night, are the most significant and hopeful development, touching that difficulty, which the past week has brought forth. The British Prime Minister's explicit statement destroyed a whole brood of lying rumors. The correspondents from Mexico have been inventing all kinds of malign British activity in secret opposition to President Wilson's Mexican policy. It was English support and English gold that were stiffening Huerta, while greedy British concessionnaires lurked around the corner. But none of this stuff and nonsense can get a hearing again after Mr. Asquith's clear utterance. In the plainest words he asserted that Great Britain had no thought of taking a line of her own in Mexico; that his Government admitted to the full the primary obligation of the United States to take the lead in seeking to restore peace to that distracted republic; and that he was ready to coöperate with President Wilson in the heartiest way. Moreover, Mr. Asquith's language conveyed a scarcely concealed warning to Gen. Huerta. The Prime Minister declared that the recognition of the Provisional President of Mexico last March was purely routine. This was before the United States Government had made, or had had an opportunity to make, any announcement of policy. But since then there has been an exchange of views between Washington and London, with the result, after "the freest and frankest discussion," of "the most perfect cordiality." The Prime Minister could hardly have gone further in notifying Gen. Huerta that, if he was counting upon any sort of diversion in his favor by Great Britain, he was doomed to disappointment.

Nor is there any reason to doubt that France and Germany are taking in all this business the same friendly and helpful attitude as England. Diplomatic negotiations of the kind undertaken by President Wilson must have involved an exchange of views all round; and it is only reasonable to assume that what England has agreed to has also obtained the assent of France and Germany. The concern of those two countries in Mexico is entirely non-political. They have highly important commercial interests there, but it will be enough for them, as Mr. Asquith states the case for England, that the United States will have full regard for legitimate foreign investments in Mexico. Naturally the continued disturbances in that country have caused much disquietude in Europe. In the Economiste Français for November 1 no less an authority than Paul Leroy-Beaulieu asserts that the Mexican situation weighs upon the financial markets of the world almost as heavily as that in the Balkans. This must be three-quarters prophecy to one-quarter of actuality, if we may judge by the evidence obtainable from the financial markets themselves. But there can be no doubt that prolonged anarchy in Mexico, or a war with the United States, would have serious consequences of a financial sort in Europe. All the more auspicious, then, is the evidence that President Wilson has been able to assure the European Governments that their Mexican interests will be safe in his hands.

The usual post-election diagnosis of the condition of the Progressive patient has now been made, and the following bulletins have been issued:

> The Bull Moose party has breathed its last.—Dr. La Follette.
> The Progressive party is the only one with strength intact.—Dr. Johnson.

If anybody is so peculiar as not to be satisfied with either of these analyses, there is nothing to prevent him from making one of his own. Dr. Johnson backs up his verdict with a bit of reasoning. The question in Massachusetts was, he says, Which party shall survive, the Republican or the Progressive? "Massachusetts answered in no uncertain tones." Well, Gardner and Bird divided 244,000 votes between them in such a way that the Progressive got 11,000 more than the Republican, while Gardner's associates ran from 50,000 to 75,000 ahead of their Progressive opponents. There does not seem to be anything so terribly conclusive about that answer—except, indeed, that neither party has the slightest chance to elect a Governor in that once well-nigh impregnable Republican stronghold. La Follette is on surer ground when he terms the Progressive movement nothing more than a protest, although he goes further than many will be able to follow him in declaring that the Progressive vote a year ago was not a Roosevelt vote. Yet few will deny that the party is on the wane, with reunion with the Republicans its only path to victory.

Attorney-General McReynolds has ruled against the sub-section in the tariff act which provides for a 5 per cent. discount on duties upon goods imported in American bottoms, and his decision will probably be generally accepted as settling the matter. Yet there is a possibility of its being contested in court; and this possibility rests on a wider basis than might at first sight be supposed. The Attorney-General's opinion, as stated by the Secretary of the Treasury, is "that the 5 per centum discount to American vessels only cannot be given without impairing the stipulations of existing treaties between the United States and various other Powers, and that consequently the sub-section, by the expressed terms of the proviso, is inoperative." If this opinion is sound—as it almost certainly is—well and good; but if, by any chance, it should be pronounced erroneous, this would seem plainly to involve the consequence that not only goods imported in American bottoms, but also those that come in the ships of almost every commercial nation in the world, would be entitled to the discount. This was manifestly not in the least the intention of Congress, and the courts would doubtless so rule; but since that intention will be defeated in one way if the Attorney-General's opinion stands and in another way if it fails, would it not be mere commonsense to repeal the sub-section at once?

The President last Thursday heard protests against the segregation now going on in the departments at Washington. Like Mr. McAdoo, he took the ground that reports in the press as to this drawing of the color line were greatly exaggerated—except that Mr. McAdoo, in the same breath, also denied it altogether. But at the very hour that Mr. McAdoo was saying this, the segregation going on in the office of the auditor for the Post Office was completed, the sixth division's colored and white clerks being separated at that time. Mr. Wilson's plea that there has not been much segregation thus far is wholly beside the point. If only ten clerks were segregated, it would be a cause for a national protest, because it would be an entering wedge for the establishment of caste in the Government service. No one can say what this precedent set by Mr. Wilson's Administration will lead to. As the Chicago Tribune puts it:

> Segregating negroes is unjust. It deepens the line of social discrimination against them. It officializes race prejudice. It is contrary to the spirit of the Constitution, to say nothing of the work of President Wilson's political patron saint, the Declaration of Independence. It has no such pragmatic justification as may be urged for white supremacy when the want of education and moral discipline among the negroes makes their dominance dangerous. It is race prejudice in its least defensible form.

The compromise award of approximately 7 per cent. increase of wages, granted by the Trainmen's Arbitration Board, is about what was generally expected. The basis of the public's approval must be chiefly confidence in the good will and the good sense of the two neutral arbitrators, Seth Low and John H. Finley. This confidence is expressed in the strongest language by the representatives of the railways on the Arbitration Board in the introductory remarks of their dissenting opinion. There is force in some of the criticisms made by the dissenting members. Against the Board's statement that "it cannot be controlled by the argument for standardization, although it may be influenced by it," the dissenting opinion flatly declares that "standardization is chimerical and uneconomic"; and if this dictum is directed against the opinion stated by the Board that because rates of pay are uniform throughout the country in the railway mail service the railways should aim at conforming with this practice, we think the dissent is well grounded. The dissentients point out that the Board rejected the trainmen's plea of increased risk, finding that in point of fact risk has decreased. But on the subject of the increased cost of living, the dissenting opinion contents itself with saying that this has not been sufficient to justify the increase granted. In this it is probably mistaken.

This increase in the expenses of the roads, following not only upon previous wage-increases, but also upon the insistent demand of the public for greater safety of travel, must necessarily bring very sharply to the front the claim of the companies for higher rates. The question is to come up before the Interstate Commerce Commission on Monday, November 24. The state of general opinion on the subject is very different now from what it was two or three years ago. The Board points towards an increase of rates as a consequence of its award. In addition to the increase in their pay-roll, the companies, if they are to satisfy the just demands of the public for greater safety and for other needed improvement, must expend great sums on rolling stock and roadbed; and it must not be forgotten that a serious enhancement of the cost of these things comes from the high rates of interest prevailing in comparison with former years. In the opposite scale of the balance, it is true, must be placed the constant tendency of the increasing scale of their business to reduce cost per unit; and it is only when a balance is struck between these things that a conclusion can fairly be reached as to whether an increase is justified.

Illinois is again undergoing agitation for amendment of its peculiarly rigid Constitution. By this it is bound against submitting amendments to more than one article at a time. Yet the provision was not inserted in the Illinois Constitution through carelessness. In the thirties, the State was sharing the mania for internal improvements that afflicted its neighbors. In 1837 the Legislature authorized appropriations of $10,000,000 for this purpose. With a population of 500,000, it accumulated a debt of $14,000,000. Small wonder, then, that the Constitutional Convention of 1848 sought to tie the Legislature hand and foot. When the Convention of 1870 assembled, the Legislature had been running wild in another direction. It passed private laws by the thousand. Some one said of it: "The Legislature meets in ignorance, sits in corruption, and dissolves in disgrace." Again the framers of the Constitution did not feel like entrusting it with too much power. The result has been that, as last year, advocates of rival amendments have blocked one another, and the Constitution has steadily become antiquated. A new Convention is urged. The simplest move would be to amend the over-rigid article, and thus permit the submission of a group of amendments at the same time, if necessary.

The Gargantuan appetite of a great university for money claims justification in the case of Columbia by something better than its recent growth and demonstrable physical needs. The report of President Butler emphasizes, not statistics of registration and expenditures, but the thoroughness and variety of the University's service. President Butler can point with pride, on the one hand, to the concern felt for the character, preparation, and homogeneity of the 800 students of Columbia College and the 600 of Barnard; to the productive scholarship of his faculty; to their stimulating relations with the universities of the Old World. On the other, he points out that the enrolment of 3,602 students in the summer session, 1,684 in Teachers College, 1,828 in extension teaching, and 1,913 in evening technical classes, has brought the registration up to 13,120—an extraordinary total; that since in 1890 "the prosecution of policies of expansion" was formulated, public donations have risen from a mere driblet to the aggregate of $25,776,704; and that many of the 900 university officers are doing notable work in their association with governmental or voluntary enterprises of various sorts. Columbia, in other words, can go before the giving public upon a combination of the issue by which our State universities appeal to the taxpayer and that by which the most conservative Eastern colleges have always claimed their clientèle.

New York's growth as a centre of educational, scientific, and artistic activity has, in the past fifteen or twenty years, been even more striking than its growth in population and wealth. The latest manifestation in this general direction is the announcement, at a meeting of the Chamber of Commerce, of a gift, by a member unnamed, of half a million dollars to provide a building for a proposed College of Commerce. This, with $200,000 which has been pledged by others for the same general purpose, but which, if the new offer is to be accepted, will go to the installation of a commercial and civic museum in the new building, will, so far as externals are concerned, assure a fine equipment for the new enterprise; the expense of maintaining the institution is, however, to be borne by the city, and accordingly its actual establishment becomes a true question of municipal policy.

The British party newspapers, in their comment on Saturday's two bye-elections, have struck the familiar note. A bye-election that goes against the Government is to the "ins" a matter of small significance, but to the "outs" a tidal wave. At Reading the seat vacated by the new Lord Chief Justice has been lost by the Liberals to the Unionists. In Scotland the Liberals have succeeded in holding a seat, but by a majority reduced from more than 2,000 to about 500. The Unionists are asserting that Home Rule has turned the country against the Government. But a plain factor in at least one election was the unfortunate split in the Liberal-Labor coalition. In 1910 Sir Rufus Isaacs won the seat at Reading that he has now vacated by a vote of 5,094 against 4,995, a slim majority of 99. On Saturday the Liberals had a Socialist-Labor candidate as well as a Unionist against them. The Liberal and Socialist candidates together polled, by an odd coincidence, just 5,094 votes. It is true that even against both, the Unionist would have had a majority of 50 votes. But the change from a Liberal majority of 99 to a Unionist majority of 50 would hardly have seemed revolutionary. Yet partisans do not go into these niceties, and there can be no doubt that the loss of Reading will be felt by the Liberals as a severe blow.

Political discussion in England is not so much superior to what we know in this country in the matter of sticking to the point. There as surely as here, if a critical press or party opponents can pick a minor flaw in the speech of a public man or the policy of the Government, everything else is for the time forgotten. The latest illustration of this is the reception accorded Lloyd George's address on the reform of the English land laws. The subject is one of vast importance, and it was dealt with by Mr. George in a serious and solid manner. But in the course of his speech, where he was touching upon the damage done to crops by game preserves, he spoke of pheasants eating turnips. Instantly the cry broke out. The man was utterly mistaken. Pheasants had never been known so much as to peck at turnips. Lloyd George replied, adducing information given him by two or three farmers. Their experience, however, appears to have been unusual. As a rule, pheasants do not eat turnips. But the thing has gone on resounding through England as if it were all that Lloyd George had talked about. No, there was one thing more. He had alluded to the large amounts of land taken out of cultivation to make deer parks. But what about the land used up in golf links? Never a word about this from Lloyd George, and he a golfer! Was there ever so huge an inconsistency? This flank attack, too, he sought to repel, but the mischief had been done. Pheasants and golf-links! One would think that the whole land debate in England had come down to those two words. Yet the English are so sober and consequent in their political discussions! If it had been Americans, now, or the flighty Irish!

Having recently, in his official capacity, to unveil a statue, Mr. Augustine Birrell made the suggestion that the time might come when orators would be employed to go about the streets of great cities and veil statues. It would be the duty of such speakers to show cause why the effigy of this or that public man, too hastily erected, should no longer encumber the view, and lead wondering visitors to ask why it was ever set up at all. If Mr. Birrell were to extend his humorous proposal to the point of abolishing statues on the score of their artistic offence, he would find many to second his motion. New York could furnish quite a crop of statues as fit candidates for taking the veil, and Washington many more. Yet when a speaker at a meeting of artists in Washington declared that the capital had more sculptured ugliness than any city in the world, Mr. Bryce protested, affirming that he could not, as a patriotic Englishman, allow that supremacy to be denied to London.

Champions of Latin nowadays are used to shocks; they are constantly hearing of the decay of Latin in Western high schools, or the colleges. But they must feel more than the usual pang in reading the news that Uruguay has legislated the subject out of her schools. Worst of all, the dispatch has reminded the editor of the South American that in the schools of Venezuela and Colombia alone does Latin survive in vigor. Various reasons are assigned for its abandonment in the rest of "Latin-America." The question of state and church is involved; while the practical motive is strong upon the Spanish-American, whose chief ambition is to be "modern." Of course, some were reluctant to recognize Latin as an antique. "Many educators fought valiantly for its retention. Some states wavered in their policy; under one régime it was abolished; under another restored, only to be cast out again when its opponents returned to power. Argentina fluctuated many years in her policy; Chili has but recently discarded the subject." Even an institution like the University of Buenos Ayres, we are told, uses Latin only as an adjunct to the scientific study of Romance grammar.

President Yuan Shi-Kai's election by a majority of the Chinese Parliament has already been followed by the expulsion of its rebellious wing, numbering 300 members. This came after an attempted curtailment of Yuan's power by the new Constitution, and thus lends color to the predictions that he would carry things with a strong hand. Ex-President Eliot has recently come back from the East with a clear sense of the need of harmony in China. Granted this, he says, and the Government "can carry on safely any kind of republic. There has always been in Chinese manners and customs a large element of democracy; the people have been accustomed to a good degree of local self-government; Chinese official life was open to all sorts of people on a high educational test; and, finally, the Chinese are patient, industrious, honest, and chiefly concerned, each man and each family, with their own affairs." Bad as a despotism would be, the want of a strong government would be worse

THE CASE OF PINDELL.

I think you have a little daughter. Think what it would mean to her all the remainder of her life to say that her father had been Minister to Russia, and of all the honor that will go with it to the third and fourth generations!

In these touching words did that great statesman, Senator Lewis of Illinois, offer an important governmental post to one of his country-editor supporters, Pindell, of Peoria, the "original Illinois Wilson man." But this did not comprise the whole of Lewis's lure to Pindell. "You will meet with the delightful companionship of the English and other officers connected with the various legations at St. Petersburg, and would be socially and officially treated as my letters to those abroad would serve you." If the Senator had been Mr. Bryan himself, the thing could not have been better done, more grandly; and when after all this Senator Lewis informed Pindell of Peoria that he would only need to serve for a year; that he could live at a hotel during this period, and not bother with any Embassy dwelling; that the State Department would see to it that there should "be no treaties to adjudicate and no political affairs to bother with," and that "trips to Berlin and Vienna and the other capitals of Europe, and also Stockholm, and perhaps to Copenhagen, and all the attendant delights that go with such trips" would be thrown in, naturally Pindell yielded. What mortal man could have resisted such a temptation?

If the prospect painted by Senator Lewis was thus irresistibly alluring, we confess that there is one thing that puzzles us. Why should the Ambassadorship have been forced on Pindell of Peoria more than another? We can understand, of course, that the State Department could not resist giving J. Hamilton Lewis the disposal of one of its Ambassadorships; sooner or later every one in public life turns to this talented Senator for aid and counsel. And then we have become accustomed to regard the diplomatic service of the United States as the roosting place of the nouveaux riches, and as the means of paying political debts. But that does not help to explain why it was so important that Peoria should have an Ambassador all for its own, why it should be Pindell of Peoria, and not Snook of Aurora, or Gould of Bone Gap, or Holt of Kankakee, or Lennie Elouise Hazel of the Coal City (Ill.) Courant—if one must have Illinois editors for Russia. But since Mr. Pindell was to promise to resign on October 14, 1914, after tasting the delights of Copenhagen, Stockholm, and Vienna, it may be that three of these other fellow-journalists of ours are to be successively nominated to see Europe at Uncle Sam's expense, and for the glory of their little daughters unto the third and fourth generations.

Now, all of this has its attractive and its humorous side; but, seriously speaking, does not this case of Pindell approximate a scandal for the Wilson Administration? Needless to say, we acquit the President of any knowledge of Mr. Lewis's letter; probably he knew nothing about the request that Pindell should resign within a year; to him may only have been told that dread political and party secret as to why it must be Pindell of Peoria, and that Mr. Bryan wished this appointment made. But it is undeniable that Mr. Wilson's appointments to the diplomatic service have as a whole been cruelly disappointing. He came into office in debt to no politicians or bosses, and with a long record of fidelity to the principle of merit in the civil service as the only proper basis for appointment and promotion; yet he seems to have yielded to political pressure much as if he were Taft or McKinley or Roosevelt. The old tradition of the use of the diplomatic offices as party rewards is not yet broken. We do not overlook or fail to give Mr. Wilson credit for such excellent appointments as those of Messrs. Walter Page and Henry Van Dyke. But these are offset by the choice of men like Messrs. Gerard and Penfield, who, whatever their fitness, were latterly chiefly conspicuous for the size of their campaign contributions.

We have had loud and numerous protests against Mr. Morgenthau's selection for Turkey, not because of any unfitness—he is conspicuously fit in many ways—but because he was the man who raised the funds for the Wilson campaign, and our growingly sensitive public conscience does not like to see the man who financed the campaign rewarded with high office. It is too much like payment for services rendered. Some of these selections have suggested the thought that Mr. Wilson was mindful of the old Princeton charges, in the days of bitter controversy, that he did not stand by his friends. The case of Pindell is to us inexplicable from any point of view. Ours is a long-suffering public; it has been accustomed to seeing misfits in our legations abroad and to smiling at the extravagances of those who sought them for social reasons or for the sake of display. But in this case, we fancy the public's smile will be a little wry.

SHOULD THE CURRENCY BILL BE AMENDED?

The time has now clearly arrived when the programme for legislation on the banking and currency bill should be definitely settled, in regard to the question whether or not the House measure should be carefully reconsidered, with a view to further perfecting it in administrative details, and to correcting any provisions which are shown to be handicaps to its efficient operation. If such a programme were to be adopted, it would be evidence that the bill is not expected to pass in the extra session, of which barely two weeks remain. If the bill were to be made law within that period, its consideration by the Senate committee, its report by that committee to the Senate, its debate on the Senate floor (where debate is unrestricted by the rules), its reference to a conference committee of both houses, the action of that committee on the sections which differ in the House and Senate bills, the debate and action of both houses on the conference report—all of these numerous stages would have to be completed by November 29.

Such an achievement would be possible, we imagine, only if the Senate committee were to report an unamended bill, or one with merely nominal amendments. The matter therefore rests, so far as regards the interests of sound legislation, on the question whether or not the existing House bill needs to be extensively amended. Our own judgment is that a number of highly important amendments are required.

We believe that, in at least three essential particulars, the bill requires amendment: in the number of regional banks, in the composition of the Federal reserve board and its relation to the Advisory Council, and in the language of the note-issue section. Furthermore, it is probable that the bill, in order to work properly, must be amplified or amended in its provisions for the Government bonds behind the present bank circulation, and in its detailed arrangements as to the manner of preparing the proposed new notes, of prescribing their denominations, and of guarding against mutilation or counterfeit. This last-mentioned class of stipulations—embodied with great care in the existing National Bank act—are singularly lacking in the House bill.

The question of the number of regional banks is not merely a matter of arithmetical or geographical preference. It involves the problem into how many separate banking districts the country could be divided without creating a number of districts whose respective banking power and capital resources would be so far inferior, compared with a district containing one or more great commercial centres, as to leave the regional banks of the weaker districts at a perpetual disadvantage. The argument that this result would be inevitable, with a dozen separate institutions of the sort, seems to us very strong. It should appeal particularly to people who expect to check the tendencies of the "Money Power." For in proportion as the interior districts are made relatively powerful by a larger area and more diversified industry, population, and resources, covered by each of them, to precisely that extent would be avoided the disparity arising from the concentration of trade resources and accumulated wealth in the Eastern cities.

The sweeping powers of the national board itself are conferred with entirely too little reservation or restriction. With Mr. Aldrich's theory that this Federal Reserve Board would manage the country's banking business, we do not agree. Its larger powers are clearly designed for use in financial emergencies. But for that very reason, the hasty, impulsive, or unwise exercise of those powers (such as we have witnessed often enough in the exercise of the Treasury's discretionary powers over the money market) should be guarded against with the utmost care. It is not necessary that bankers should have a dominating voice in the national board; but it is, in our judgment, absolutely essential that people directly in touch with the financial and business situation should participate officially in its deliberations.

The Bankers' Convention thought that a minority membership in the board itself, chosen by the regional banks, would solve the problem. The alternative of admitting to all meetings of that board (though without a vote) the Advisory Council similarly chosen, in order that their judgment might be surely obtained, has appealed to us more strongly. Regarding the composition of the board itself, the argument has of late been pressed that the three Government officers, now proposed for it, ought not to be included. It has been urged that, as regards the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of Agriculture, membership would mean imposing on men already exceptionally busy with other matters, and often overworked, the burden of these new responsibilities, and that, in the case of the Controller of the Currency, it amounts to placing on the board the public officer who should be its agent. This is the theory of the present National Bank law. That question, and the question whether the eight-year term, now provided for members of the board, ought not to be extended, deserve consideration.

With the objection of Mr. Vanderlip and others to the pending bill's description of the proposed new notes as "obligations of the Government," "issued for the purpose of making advances to Federal reserve banks, and for no other purpose," we entirely concur, but not on the grounds assigned by Mr. Vanderlip. His argument that the notes are fiat money, because, though a "loan to regional banks," they "have no reserve whatever provided by the Government," leads nowhere at all. Real fiat-money issues are forced loans, made because it is inconvenient for a Government to borrow otherwise, and because a Government's creditors can be forced by law to take the notes. But even assuming the assertion of the bill to be correct, as Mr. Vanderlip appears to do, that the notes are loans by Government to banks, we should have a queer inversion of the fiat-money theory. As a simple matter of fact, they are not fiat money; nor are they Government "advances" to the banks. They are simply notes whereby the banks are permitted, on the basis of rigidly prescribed reserve, collateral, and redemption guarantees, openly to borrow from the public for the purpose of providing convenient but temporary instruments of exchange. The language of the act which describes this operation differently from the description of the issue of national banknotes in the existing law, is mere jugglery with words and definitions, and ought to be either radically changed or stricken entirely from the law which it defaces.

DEMOCRATIC REORGANIZATION IN NEW YORK.

All that has happened since election day confirms the first vivid impression made by the great rout of Murphy and his crew—namely, that Tammany has become impossible as the synonym of the Democratic party in New York city. The Hall has usurped the name, but only to sully it. The burden of Tammany has long been grievous to honest Democrats, in and out of New York, and now they feel that it is too great to be borne. In some way or other, the party must cut itself loose from the Wigwam. The sentiment in favor of this is to-day cumulative. It was first reflected in the press. Then came President Wilson's telegram congratulating Mayor-elect Mitchel, "with all my heart." This could not but be taken as highly significant. On the face of it, a Democratic President was cheering on a man who had badly defeated the Democratic party in New York city—the only party, at least, so entitled to call itself on the official ballot. But behind the form of words everybody could see that the President must be rejoicing over the downfall of men who were merely masquerading as Democrats, and that he was looking forward to a rescue of the party name from vile associations. The publication of his telegram to Mr. Mitchel at once gave an added impulse to the movement for thoroughgoing Democratic reorganization in New York.

Some of the early suggestions of ways and means struck wildly. Tammany was to be "destroyed" out of hand. But this could hardly mean that 250,000 voters were somehow to be compelled to declare that they would never again support a Tammany ticket. Others proposed that Tammany should be "reformed," preferably "from the inside." Murphy was to be made to walk the plank, and some gentleman in hiding in the hold of the ship brought out to take command. But this could impose on only a few. Those who have wintered and summered with Tammany know that the more you reform it, the more it remains the same thing. There have been several "new" Tammanies within the past twenty-five years, but each one has presently reminded the city of the evil spirit that went into the house, swept and garnished, taking with him seven devils worse than himself. Tammany reformed from the inside would be either a farce or a tragedy. Tammany's "inside" is the last thing that it would be wise to exhibit to a city already nauseated by the outside!

Even the more astute Tammany men see this, and are thinking of themselves dropping the name. They perceive that it taints everything it touches, that it is a drag to the Democratic party in State and nation alike; and they now have the happy thought of simply leaving it off their letter-heads and their party calls. But if the thing remains, the getting rid of the name will amount to nothing. It is the Tammany spirit, not its nomenclature, that the city is now roused against. What decent Democrats are asked to drive out and supplant is a corrupt organization, which would smell no sweeter by another name, or without any name at all. And there is a growing conviction that the work is to be done by organizing a Democratic party in the city entirely independent of Tammany Hall. It is not a question of a temporary protest, or of a factional secession—such as was too much the character of the Irving Hall Democracy, and even the County Democracy—but of a broad and comprehensive and persistent effort to band together reputable Democrats in New York. Their hope would be, of course, to make of themselves so strong and permanent a political force that they could, before long, carry the party primaries and win the right to be known officially as the Democratic party. But there should be no illusions about the nature of the work that it will be necessary to do. It will be no holiday task. The best brains and the finest organizing and executive ability that can be procured will be requisite; and while no time must be lost in beginning to plan and invite co-operation, a great deal of time will have to be spent on the complex details and the arduous execution.

City Democrats could be immensely helped by a reorganized Democratic party up the State; and there are signs that Tammany will soon be compelled to retract its claws from above the Bronx. All that Gov. Glynn has thus far said, with all that he has done, implies that he is keenly alive to the importance of an up-State Democracy wholly independent of Tammany. This was for years the policy of the ablest Democratic leaders in New York. Little by little it was lost sight of, and under Gov. Dix it was frittered away. If Gov. Glynn is able to restore it, as there is every indication that he will endeavor to do, he will deserve well both of his party and of the State. Certainly, the elements for a new Democratic alignment, throughout the interior of the State as well as in this city, lie ready to the hands of intelligent and honest party managers. It is a golden opportunity. If availed of as it should be, Democrats of New York will be enabled to hold up their heads again, as in the days of Tilden and Cleveland; and if Tammany is finally reformed altogether, there will be thousands of Democrats in other States—and some even in Washington—who will rejoice to see the curse removed.

THE LAST OF THE VICTORIANS.

With the death of Alfred Russel Wallace there disappears the last of that great breed of men with whose names the glory of the Victorian era is inseparably bound up. The reign of Queen Victoria extended from 1837 to 1901; but it is with a group of men all of whom were in the full vigor of their powers during the two decades from 1850 to 1870 that we associate the idea of the Victorian age as a distinctive epoch. If, in the mind's eye, we could marshal the long procession of their departing figures, it would be indeed an impressive array. The line—unless we were to go back to Macaulay, who died in 1859—stretches back just half a century from the present date, for it begins with Thackeray, whose death, at the age of fifty-two, took place in 1863; and then came in succession—to name only the most shining figures—Dickens and Mill and George Eliot and Carlyle and Darwin and Browning and Tennyson and Gladstone and Spencer. Wallace, surviving in the full enjoyment of his intellectual and spiritual energy to the age of nearly ninety-one, is now no more, and he was the last of the line.

It cannot be said that Wallace took as large a place in the story of his time, that he was as potent an influence in its life or in the moulding of its thought, as any of the illustrious ten the roll of whose names we have just called. This is true in spite of his undisputed claim to independent and simultaneous promulgation, with Darwin, of a discovery which forms one of the landmarks in the history of human thought. The doctrine of natural selection was conceived and expressed as clearly by Wallace as by Darwin; and, had there been no Darwin, quite possibly the name of Wallace would be attached to it. Yet by no means certainly; for, though Wallace, too, supported the theory by a rich store of observed facts, the dominating element in its conquest of the world of science was that marvellous array of varied evidence, collected with infinite patience, analyzed with rare precision, and discussed in an exemplary spirit of scientific impartiality, which, beginning with the publication of the "Origin of Species" in 1859, formed the unrivalled distinction of Darwin's work.

As for the attitude of these two scientific worthies towards each other, the history of thought might be searched in vain for anything more ideal. Never has there been more absolute contemporaneity in the announcement of a great discovery; and yet never has there been a more complete absence of jealousy or strife. Neither of the men seems ever to have cast so much as a breath of doubt on the merit of the other. In Wallace's latest book, written after the close of his nineticth year, the names Darwin and Darwinism are used with a total absence of arrière pensée—without the slightest hint that the fame which has accrued almost entirely to Darwin alone ought in justice to be shared with a greater approach to equality by his fellow-discoverer; and Darwin's attitude was equally high-minded. And this record derives added interest from its contrast with what happened in the case of a greater than Darwin. Newton was not less high-minded than Darwin, not less superior to the ordinary jealousies of scientific rivalry; but through the overzeal of friends he was dragged into a controversy with Leibnitz over the invention of the infinitesimal calculus which gave rise to much bitterness, but which the judgment of posterity has unmistakably settled by recognizing the full claim of each to the honor of independent discovery.

Wallace's equal share in the original promulgation of the doctrine of the origin of species by means of natural selection is his most signal title to fame; but it is by no means the measure either of his scientific achievements or of his general powers. Indeed, in ranking him among the truly notable figures of his generation, one thinks not so much of his most famous achievement, but rather of the wide sweep of his scientific labors, the freshness and originality of his outlook, the vigor and energy of his attack on all manner of questions relating to man and society, and a certain quality of largeness which marks his style as it does that of the great Victorians generally. In one respect, he stands perhaps alone among them, though it is natural to couple with him in this two others of very different type. We refer to the zeal with which Wallace, even in extreme old age, looked forward to the salvation of mankind in a not too distant future through radical changes in the institutions of human society. In John Stuart Mill, the hope and purpose of human betterment burned with a steady flame throughout his life; the salient feature of Gladstone's career was the process, the reverse of that witnessed in most men, by which he gradually passed from extreme conservatism to the most advanced liberalism consistent with the English ideal of safe and orderly progress. Wallace's temper was wholly different from that of either the philosopher or the statesman; nor was it, in relation to human affairs, the temper of the man of science. His dicta, both upon the wretchedness of the present in comparison with the past and upon the possibilities of the future in comparison with the present, are guided rather by a noble, but almost blind, enthusiasm than by the clear light of reason.

It is more than half a century since the epoch-making paper embodying the conclusions of Darwin and Wallace was read to the Linnæan Society. The doctrine of natural selection had to fight its way to general adoption, but before very long it acquired supreme dominion; and this not only in the biological sciences, but in almost every domain of human thought. During the period of its struggle for acceptance, the greatest difficulty it encountered arose from the misunderstanding of its true meaning by scientific men who opposed it; in later times misunderstanding of its true meaning by unscientific men who have swallowed but not digested it has been productive of a not inconsiderable crop of shallow and mischievous judgments. In both these respects its history has been remarkably similar to that of the doctrine of Malthus, to whose work both Darwin and Wallace owed the first impulse towards their discovery. And the analogy holds pretty closely as to a further stage of the matter. That the doctrine of Malthus has been exploded a thousand times, everybody knows; but those who really know the doctrine know that what has been exploded is only a misunderstanding of it. The case with the Darwinian theory is somewhat different, as is natural in view of the infinitely greater complexity of the problem. The researches of the past fifty years, and especially of the past twenty, have undoubtedly made necessary many modifications of the views expressed by Darwin. They have brought about a considerable shifting of emphasis in this respect and that; and they have of course filled up great gaps which he left in the doctrine of heredity. But the essence of the matter remains as he left it, and even the modifications are in large measure of a kind that he allowed for. When a man talks of Darwin as a "back number," or the doctrine of natural selection as "exploded," it is pretty safe to set him down as one of those to whom the latest thing in the newspapers is the last word of science.

PANAMA AND SOCIALISM.

A familiar tag in current literature dealing with our achievements on the Isthmus of Panama is one which describes the building of the Canal as an impressive demonstration of Socialist theory. The Socialists, we must admit, have themselves been cautious in citing Panama as an argument in behalf of their economic and political principles. They are aware that it is an instance which cuts two ways. But the general public, to which Socialism is vaguely synonymous with the extension of governmental functions, seems to have been impressed by the record for zeal and efficiency which the Government, as its own contractor, has established on the Isthmus. The splendid system of sanitation which made the building of the Canal possible, the model housing for the American employees, the management of the food supply, have all been quoted as illustrations of what can be done by a nation which sets itself to a great task. The idealism of it all is the fact upon which Mr. Ray Stannard Baker has laid most stress in an article in the American Magazine. Efficiency and idealism undoubtedly have been manifested at Panama, but to what extent has Socialist theory really been justified?

By the Socialists themselves, government ownership and operation is not accepted as unqualifiedly tantamount to Socialism. The more advanced element among the Socialists has, as a matter of fact, come to look upon the entrance of the state into the economic field as a menace to the ultimate fulfilment of the Socialist ideal. What the average citizen looks upon as Socialism, these radicals are now in the habit of describing as "State Capitalism." In the extension of governmental functions in industry they profess to discover a serious danger to the emancipation of the working class and the establishment of true industrial democracy. What shall it avail them that the state take over the management of railways and mines and other public utilities, if the "classes" at present intrenched in power retain control of the state? The more conservative elements among the Socialists, those, for instance, at present in control of the Socialist party in this country, have no such fear of "State Capitalism"; but they, too, are careful to define the conditions in which state ownership can approach the Socialist ideal. In Socialist platforms and speeches the demand for the extension of government powers is now qualified by the phrase "under democratic control." The need for making a distinction between social democracy and benevolent despotism is plainly felt.

From this point of view the Panama Canal does not lend itself to the Socialist argument. It is precisely a benevolent despotism that has been functioning on the Isthmus. The results obtained have been obtained through a system of almost military discipline. Gifted autocrats like Col. Goethals and Col. Gorgas have imposed their standards on an army of workmen gathered from all corners of the earth. A benevolent Government has built model homes and hospitals and furnished the workers at Panama with much better food than the average inhabitant of the States can obtain, at prices lower than those which obtain in this country. Panama, therefore, is not an experiment in economic democracy, for the double reason that political and social conditions there have been regulated from above, and that it has been isolated from the play of economic forces which prevail in the world at large. If Government abattoirs could sell meat at lower rates to the people of any State than to the people of every other State in the Union, we should have a real parallel to Panama. And if popular elections would always give us a Goethals for the post of construction engineer and a Gorgas for sanitary engineer, the parallel would be still closer.

A nation's idealism may very well have been brought into play at Panama; and it may be that in the course of time the same spirit of idealism will be applied to the humdrum occupations of a people. But it may as well be recognized that idealism and efficiency are not necessarily coincident with democracy. New York could very probably be made a model city in a few years if Col. Goethals were installed as Mayor with absolute powers, if Col. Gorgas were placed in absolute charge of the Health and the Tenement-House Departments, and if Gen. Leonard Wood, let us say, were to receive an absolutely free hand with the police. This fact may well be kept in mind when we are asked to consider as so frequently we are, the superior efficiency of municipal government in Europe. Eminently desirable as it would be to apply German standards of municipal foresight, economy, and honesty to our own city governments, it is a question whether this nation would welcome, or ought to welcome, such improvements at the cost of democratic initiative. It is the hope of our best citizenship that the standards of municipal government in this country can be raised without impairing the spirit of democracy. But it is certainly no argument in behalf of the possibility of such a consummation to speak of what has been accomplished by military methods at Panama.

CHAPTERS FROM IMPOSSIBLE AUTOBIOGRAPHIES.

(From "Lotus Days," by Th-o-o-e Ro-s-v-lt.)

The ship was now stemming the swirling current of the La Plata. In another hour or two we should be in Buenos Ayres. I sighed. Those soft, languorous days under the southern sun were over. Life with its hurly-burly would have me in its grasp. I shuddered as I thought of what awaited me there in the restless metropolis—the throngs in the street; the noise: the confusion; the crowded halls; the salvos of applause; the lecture platform with the glare of the calcium lamp trained on the speaker's table; the frantic rush from the lecture hall to the hotel, to the City Hall, to the museum, to the aquarium, to the foundling asylum, to the railway station; the stuffy Pullman berth—the prospect terrified me. I smiled wistfully at the captain of the boat. He was a good man. Through a terrific three days' gale he had navigated his ship without a word of advice from me. From him I turned to my friend the archæologist, for whom I had formed a particular attachment. We had spent many hours together every day of the voyage, but I had told him nothing of the latest excavations in northern Arabia, of the funeral customs of the Aztecs, of the law of divorce among the Egyptians of the seventeenth dynasty. He used to beat me regularly at quoits and horse billiards, and I was happy to be defeated. Now it was all over. . . . The ship was swinging in to her dock. I looked down on the waiting crowd and discerned several young men with note books and lead pencils. "Gentlemen of the press," the captain whispered. I shuddered.

In the garden where I used to play during my long summer vacations there was a gay Chinese pagoda, where the grown-ups drank tea when the weather was fine. At other times it stood locked, as a precaution against us children. The Chinese pagoda was a palace of faery to us. There was just one window, a large window with many little panes of blue and red and yellow. We would climb up on chairs and peer through this window into the dim, mysterious interior. The window fascinated me. It seemed to shut off the common world we knew from a world of enchantment. It held me spellbound, but it frightened me, too. I was torn between the desire to find out what lay beyond the window and the fear that something might happen to those lovely little panes of glass. One day the village drunkard's son climbed over the garden wall. He picked up a stone and sent it crashing through the window. I shrieked and fled. To the present day I cannot hear the noise of broken glass without a rush of tears to my eyes.

(From "Confessions of a Vegetarian," by J-ck L-nd-n.)

My evolution into a lover of peanut-butter was predetermined from the first moment the cosmic life breathed into the plasmic germ that was destined through the æons to become Me. How otherwise explain this horror for blood which possesses me at the sight of a mutton chop? I am a Socialist, but my gorge will rise at the sight of the red flag, because it reminds me of raw beefsteak. As we eat, so shall we think. So long as humanity's molars go tearing through brawn and muscle and cartilage, how shall man attain the life of mystic contemplation, of surcease from struggle, of sublime acquiescence? So I reason as a man. As an author I find walnuts and whole wheat ideal. They give me the requisite energy for producing my novel once every four years, and my short stories twice a year. Life is made to dream. I sense the call of the cloister. To sink into the depths of contemplation, to reduce myself to the state of the abysmal thinker, that is all I have ever asked of life. The sharp staccato of my typewriter rasps my inner ear to the awful procession of the ages. My faith is unshaken in the ultimate Nirvana, where book royalties and moving-picture scenarios are as naught.

(From "Upward to the Light," by V-ct-r-a-o Hu-rta.)

Let me confess. I adore flowers; their color, their fragrance, the exquisite architecture of leaf and tendril and filament. My favorite flower is the lily, but they are all dear to me. In their infinite variety they are so many tiny silver voices swelling to a mighty chorus in praise of Creation—the true, the beautiful, the good. I have been at pains to master the symbolic language of flowers, the rose for loyalty, and the violet for self-sacrifice, and the primrose for tenderness and mercy, and the pansy for remembrance. Without flowers, without poetry, without music, life would be unendurable. I grudge the hours which I must spend away from my garden, harassed by the cares of state which fortune has thrust upon me.

RECENT ITALIAN LITERATURE.

Rome, October 23.

Since the death of Carducci and Pascoli, the last survivors of the great school of modern Italian poetry, no predominant figure has appeared in this field. Although a number of writers, some of them cultured and talented, continue to bring out slim volumes of verse, a very small part of this production is of a high order, or, indeed, can be held to rank as real poetry at all. "Volumes Written in Verse" is the sarcastic title of a review of recent Italian poetry by a severe but by no means unfair critic in the Nuova Antologia. Italy is not perhaps in much worse condition, in this dearth of poetical output, than are other countries to-day, and it should seem as though poetry were not the form of literary expression best adapted to modern life and ideas. One of the most sympathetic contemporary Italian poets is Angelo Orvieto, and in his latest volume, "Le Sette Leggende" (Milan: Treves), he tells seven romantic and symbolical tales in verse which, if not of the very first rank, is always distinguished, polished, and genuine, and has moments of real poetic feeling. Lamberto Carlini's "La Corona dei mesi" (Milan: Lanzini), a sort of poetical calendar of the months, dedicated in an odd and somewhat absurd preface to the author's late lamented grandfather, is not without some inspiration and freshness in the descriptions of the characteristic features of the different seasons. Franco Caracci's "Campane a Sera" (Palermo: Sandron) is an imitation of Pascoli, impregnated with melancholy, but lacking in clearness. Giuseppe Scalia, in his volume of "Rime" (Catania: Giannotta), aspires to imitate Carducci; he does not lack culture, and his sonnets give evidence of a sense of poetry, but he shows little originality. "I Canti dei Vecchi Goliardi," by Curio Mortari (Padova: Nuovi Goliardi), is the beginning of a lengthy account in verse of a somewhat complicated crime. Giovanni Orsini's ambitious "Poema di Lepanto" (Milan: Libreria editrice milanese) is so full of uncouth words and disused expressions that the author has found it advisable to append a glossary to his production. D'Annunzio did the same thing in his poems on the Turco-Italian war, and he is evidently finding imitators in this as in his other idiosyncrasies, but then D'Annunzio's war poems are really inspired poetry.

In the field of fiction, too, the output is not very abundant, and no novels of the first rank have appeared quite recently. Fogazzaro is dead, and D'Annunzio, since "Forse che sì, forse che no," has written nothing but plays in French verse and a few strange but powerful essays. The most interesting of recent Italian novels is perhaps Luciano Zuccoli's "La Freccia nel Fianco" (Treves). It is the story of a girl of refined feelings and originality brought up among opulent surroundings by worthy but extremely commonplace and bourgeois parents. Deprived of such human intercourse as was likely to attract her, she accidentally becomes the friend and confidant of a little boy of seven, the son of a brilliant, clever, extravagant roué and an irresponsible, sensuous, and equally spendthrift mother. The parents are separated, and each in turn has charge of the boy, who is hurried about from Paris to Vienna and from Milan to Monte Carlo, now living in a style of lavish luxury, now made to subsist in strict economy. Child as Brunello is, he understands instinctively how utterly impossible is this manner of life, and the author has depicted his mental development with rare insight, so that one is attracted by the portrait of the boy, who in less skilful hands might have become an insupportable prig. The girl Nicoletta loses her little companion, who is carried off from the villa where he was staying with his father, to Paris, and in due course, having refused the hand of a noble suitor whom she despised, marries a rich and kind-hearted manufacturer, with whom she lives happily for some years. Then Brunello appears on the scene once more, no longer a child, but a handsome, fascinating, highly cultured youth; the recollection of past comradeship cannot be cancelled—this is "the arrow in the side" whence the novel takes its name—and inevitably develops into a deeper and more dangerous feeling. Both feel this; Nicoletta declares that she could never survive if she were unfaithful to her husband, to whom she is really attached. Passion having at last overcome both moral scruples and reason, she keeps her vow and commits suicide. The thèse is a bold one, but Signor Zuccoli handles it with a sure touch and a thorough mastery of style; he begins in a gentle idyllic tone, the main plot being varied with descriptions of scenery and humorous episodes, but as he nears the end the tints become more sombre and the manner more dramatic, leading up to the final tragedy.

Grazia Deledda continues her cycle of Sardinian stories, which have now reached a considerable number, and her latest volume, "Canne al Vento" (Treves), is not very different from its predecessors. Her object seems to be the same throughout her literary career, viz., to make her readers understand the conditions of life in her native island, and the characters, necessities, and ideas of the people. Although the plots and episodes vary, the tone and coloring are always the same, always of the gloomiest and most melancholy; and in this we do not think that she is quite true to her subject. Sardinia is not the hopelessly depressing place she depicts it, nor are all its inhabitants so utterly without will power. In the novel under review the characters seem even more helpless than in the others; they are indeed canne al vento—reeds blown this way and that by the wind—and no one has the strength to fight against fate. Yet in the end, except for the strange, faithful old serving man, Efix, an almost Biblical personage, both in his mode of expression and in his way of thought, who dies amid the sound of wedding bells, the characters marry and presumably live happily ever after, if any one can ever be really happy in Grazia Deledda's gray world. The account of the wanderings of Efix, begging his way with two blind companions, from fair to fair and from festa to festa, is one of the most curious and powerful episodes in the book, and has more than a touch of Gorky; yet one is at a loss to understand why he ever set forth on his travels, or why, having done so, he ever returned.

Ricciotto Civinini's "Gente di Palude" (Treves) is another novel of local color, the scene being laid at Maccarese, a vast swampy district in the Roman Campagna, near the sea. Like most writers who deal with this part of the world, the author seems so filled with its overpowering natural features that he accentuates them unduly, depicting his characters as though they, too, were wholly and perpetually absorbed in the great marshland. Some of the pictures of the lonely life in the Campagna are effective, but there is much exaggeration and at least one impossible episode.

Among the collections of short stories Ugo Ojetti's "L'Amore e suo figlio" (Treves) may be mentioned. The author, who is a journalist, art critic, and dramatist, as well as a writer of fiction, is at his best in his humorous, keenly satirical sketches on topical subjects, such as he often publishes in the Corriere della Sera, but in this volume the stories are, with one exception (the first, which gives its title to the book), rather unpleasant in tone, although written in a concise, effective style. The characters are mostly disagreeable, and often vulgar, and the situations, if grimly ironical, are of the kind which makes one feel uncomfortable. Of a different order are Riccardo Pierantoni's "Novelle Marinare" (Rome: Nalato), tales of seafaring life, full of that love of the sea which characterized the author from his early youth. One of them, "Giallo e Nero," is based on the experiences of the brothers Bandiera, when, as Austrian naval officers, they took part in the joint Austro-Anglo-Turkish expedition to Acre in 1840. It was in making researches for this tale that the idea suggested itself to Signor Pierantoni of writing the book which he published some years ago on the fatal expedition of those same Bandiera brothers to the Calabrian coast, a valuable addition to our knowledge of Italian Risorgimento history. A melancholy interest attaches to these novelle, which were collected and partly revised by this promising young writer on his deathbed, and brought out after his premature decease by his mother and sister.

A book which cannot be classed either as poetry or fiction, although it shows both imagination and poetical feeling, is Emilio Bodrero's "I Giardini di Adone" (Rome: Bontempelli). The author, a busy official in a Government department, finds time to devote to the highest forms of culture and to philosophical studies, and has acquired a purely classical spirit and style such as is equalled by very few moderns. He is a humanist to the finger tips and thoroughly steeped in Greek thought and feeling. After bringing out essays on various Greek philosophers, he has produced in this new volume a series of dialogues on philosophical subjects set forth in language of rare beauty. His style now reminds one of the stately logical periods of Plato, now of the witty satire of Lucian, and all through there runs a vein of paradox which is never unreasonable, with a genuine sense of fantasy and poetry. The spirit of these dialogues is a tendency to rebel against soulless rationalism and cold materialistic reason. Fantasy, in the author's view, is everything, whereas bare facts and plain truths are but a small part of the higher and more real truth of life. One of the most characteristic essays is that entitled "Ahasuero o la verità"; the dialogue is held in some mythical Eastern land under the sway of Prester John. There all the famous mythological personages of tradition are gathered together—Linus, the founder of song; Hippolita, the Queen of the Amazons; Marcus Curtius, who rode into the abyss in the Roman Forum; St. Ursula, who was martyred with her 11,000 companions; Roland, the female Pope Joan, Til Eulenspiegel, Naundorf, etc.—awaiting the day when they shall be called back to the world. But the wandering Jew Ahasuerus, who symbolizes cold reason, comes in among them and tells them that they are myths and that they never have existed; to which Prester John and the others reply that they are the real truth, for humanity has created them, the creatures of its dreams and fancies, as an incitement to great deeds:

> Reality! But for what object would it exist if not to render humanity sublime in its dreams? We are progress and history, we whose existence you bestially deny. All that you say is blind, incomprehensible formula, whereas what man requires is fantasy. Wherefore have you killed it, O implacable destroyer? But you will not prevail, O mortal enemy, and we shall always be history and truth, morality and example, when, after our victory we shall return to the world which awaits us in order to understand itself once more. Shame and curses on him who bereft humanity of its fairest creation!

The witty dialogue between Lucian of Samosata and the impostor Alexander of Abonouteichos follows somewhat on the same lines, and tends to prove that by imposing on humanity one renders it happy. In a different vein is the discussion in "La Passeggiata" between Polyphilus the poet, Xenodotus the archæologist, and Heliodorus the philosopher on the monuments of Rome, the archæologist maintaining that only the ancient buildings and remains should be preserved and excavated, and all the work of the Middle Ages and the Renaissance ruthlessly swept away, while the poet is for the preservation of everything that is beautiful, and holds that a temple turned in later ages into a church is lovelier than a cold, carefully preserved ruin where all is ticketed and catalogued. The philosopher, acting as arbiter, decides that each age will be judged by posterity for what it preserves and for what it produces, and that sometimes, in destroying the relics of the past, men may be producing documents of yet greater value. "There is a fate which none of us know, wherefore on the manner in which we shall know how to live among our memories, posterity will base its judgment on our value." Altogether, "I Giardini di Adone" is one of the most remarkable and original books published in Italy in recent times.

NEWS FOR BIBLIOPHILES.

The Bibliophile article of the Nation of September 11 has just come to my notice, in which Mr. Leo Newmark writes of a rare German translation of Boswell's "Life of Johnson" published by Nicolovius at Königsberg in 1797. About the translator, who signs as M. L., Mr. Newmark says: ". . . a little bibliographic research soon disclosed her to have been one Dorothea Mathilde Liebeskind. More research revealed nothing further about her."

I see no reason why the investigator should have encountered the difficulty expressed in the last sentence. The reference works to which one naturally turns for information on a German author of the end of the eighteenth century readily yield the desired data. Dorothea Margaretha (I do not find Mathilde) Liebeskind and her literary activity are briefly, but adequately, treated in several volumes of Meusel's "Gelehrtes Teutschland" (5th ed., 1796 ff.), as also in Goedeke's indispensable "Grundriss zur Geschichte der deutschen Dichtung" (2nd ed., Vol. VI, pp. 426-7). From these sources it appears that Frau Liebeskind, first married to J. N. Forkel, a musical director, afterwards to J. H. Liebeskind, a prominent jurist in Munich, was born in 1765 as the daughter of a Göttingen professor, Wedekind. During her younger years, from about 1790 to 1797, she must have been exceedingly busy with rapid hack translations from the English. Her numerous titles as quoted in Goedeke include, for instance, Godwin's "Caleb Williams" (1795), and voluminous renderings from the novels of Mrs. Radcliffe, Mrs. Lennox, Mrs. Charlotte Smith, and other sensational and phantastic writers of that day. Even this list, however, fails to record a not unimportant part of Frau Liebeskind's efforts, not published under her own name, in the field of semi-scientific works of travel and history, as, for instance, the "History of the American Revolution," by David Ramsay, the South Carolinian. A number of theso more scholarly translations were brought out with the coöperation and under the name of no less a personage than the high-minded, but ill-starred, Johann Georg Forster (1754-1794), whom literary and political history remembers in connection with Cook's "Voyage around the World . . . during tho years 1772, 3, 4, and 5," and with the short-lived revolutionary movement at Mayence in the years 1792 and 1793.

Speaking of Mrs. Liebeskind's German Boswell, Mr. Newmark mentions with apparent surprise the liberal taste which Friedrich Nicolovius, its publisher, must have presumed generally to exist among the Germans for translations from the English. As a basis for this statement he refers to a translation of Butler's "Hudibras" which the same publisher brought out in the same year as that of Boswell's "Life of Johnson." Here, too, a little research would easily have shown the wide range of German interest in English letters during the last half of the eighteenth century, a range of interest that included far less attractive things than old Butler's crude, but vigorous, attack on English Puritanism. As a matter of fact, the 1797 edition of "Hudibras," published at Königsberg, was merely a revision of the translation by D. W. Soltau, originally published by Hartknoch in Riga in 1787. But even that was no first attempt at introducing Butler's satire to German readers, nor indeed the last. Only a few years ago, "Hudibras in Germany" was considered sufficiently important to be made the subject of a special study by Prof. Harvey W. Thayer in the Publications of the Modern Language Association of America, Vol. XXIV, pp. 547-584.

Mrs. Liebeskind as a translator from the English and Butler's "Hudibras" in German prove thus to be topics well within the range of ordinary bibliographic knowledge.

But for a right appreciation of the German attitude not only towards English, but towards foreign literature in general, it is necessary to keep in mind a fundamental principle which in no small measure distinguishes the German people from most of their neighbors on both sides of the Atlantic. It would be folly to try to express it more tersely than it was put hy Goethe in his famous last letter, addressed to Wilhelm von Humboldt a few days before the great poet's death. What Goethe there says of individual development applied, he felt sure, no less to national culture:

> Das beste Genie ist das, welches alles in sich aufnimmt, sich alles zuzueignen weiss, ohne dass es der eigentlichen Grundbestimmung, demjenigen, was man Charakter nennt, im mindesten Eintrag tue, vielmehr solches noch erst recht erhebe, und durchaus nach Möglichkeit befähige.

HETCH-HETCHY: THE REAL POINT IGNORED.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In urging the Senate to take time for reflection before giving away Hetch-Hetchy, you have done a service to the valley through which its waters flow and to which they are a vital necessity. The irrigated parts are but small and sparse oases. I have passed over that country four times of late, and there have been hours when only a wilderness of gray sand was visible from the train. To this parched territory the waters of Hetch-Hetchy rightly belong, and when it is served there will be no surplus left for San Francisco. Give them away now and you leave hundreds of thousands of acres as barren as the street.

This featuro of the case has been carefully concealed by the San Francisco press, which has answered John Muir's plea for the scenery with ridicule; but in a question of life or death, affecting a very large territory, ridiculo will hardly count.

Mr. Church, M. C. for the district, says the farmers are willing to surrender the water. What farmers? Certainly not those who have not yet procured water, and who are in the vast majority.

Does not San Francisco need the water? Not now. And when it does there is abundance of surplus water in the American, the Yuba, and the Feather, to say nothing of Tahoe and the other lakes.

DEANS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In turning over a number of college catalogues the other day, I found myself constantly facing the word "dean"—dean of women, of course; dean of the school, department, college (the name was legion), of engineering; dean of the college, department, of arts and sciences, liberal arts; dean of the school of agriculture. But there were other deans—dean of the school, department, college, of education; dean of the school of journalism; dean of the school of chemistry (actually); and—dean of deans. The last title strikes one as Biblical, the others, most of them, as essentially Miltonic. But I would catch the significance of it all, and am wondering if a reader of the Nation might not spring up to my aid.

What, pray, is all the deanerie about? Is it true that the word once meant something, and now, like "judge" and "colonel," in certain districts, is travelling the slippery path of nonsense? It looks as if "judge" and "colonel" and "dean" were exhibits of that same species of snobbery (English usage) which clings to American modes of thought; I find also, as in these other cases, that the further one travels from the centres, the more lush is likely to be the growth of deans. In some of our State universities, indeed, it is difficult to escape them. Mark Twain once spoke of not being able to fire a revolver off your back porch in Cambridge without bringing down a two-volumer; there is a place I know, west of Suez, where you can hardly hurl a stone at a cat without bruising the shins of a dean. And the dean may be a very pleasant fellow, too; he is simply under the shadow of a monstrous name.

Some say that presidents are to blame—that if they wish to raise a man's salary without hurting any other man's feelings they create some sort of hecus-pocus, and name the man dean of it. But there must be other, more philosophical, explanations. I am aware of a department of journalism of two instructors, one of them a dean. I know of a department of education, exactly on a plane with a department of political science or of physics, and yet the head of the department is called dean. I have intimations of a graduate school, without graduate courses, and yet it is presided over by a dean.

Not many years ago there appeared in one of our leading dailies an article on "The Flummery of Caps and Gowns," the point being that there was no tradition, no texture of life, which made it worth while for us in America to play with these academic adornments; the practice was undemocratic. This protest, I imagine, was without avail; perhaps the tradition had already been created; and possibly the vice of flummery is venial. But not so with the sin of snobbery. Would it be imaginable, I wonder, for this "snobbery of deans," as well as all other species and varieties of snobbery, to die a national, hasty, and certain death? EDWARD A. THURBER.

CAFETARIA.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The following is taken from the Evening Post: "Downstairs there is to be a cafétaria, that modern expedient for getting the most lunch for the least money."

In this town we have several of these institutions, though our spelling is cafeteria. Now can any of your readers throw light upon the origin of the term? It is quite recent, say within ten years, or even less. It looks like an American growth; I have not found anything resembling it in French, Italian, or Spanish dictionaries. It serves to designate an eating place somewhere between a tea room and a restaurant.

DIALECT POETRY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: "I' b'en a-kindo musin', as the feller says," since I read the letter in last week's issue under the caption, "is 'Hoosier Poetry' Appropriate in the Nation?" The writer refers to the dialect verses which you quoted in your editorial, "The Hoosier Poet," as "barbaric puerilities," a "dialect that needs no example or precept among our young people"; and he ends his tirade with the sweeping assertion that "the existence of such corruptions of English is merely a misfortune; their reproduction in the Nation is a calamity."

May I offer a humble remonstrance to this jeremiad? Literature is a reflection of life. When an author depicts a person, he should make him speak "in character," and we know that some characters do not express their thoughts and emotions in choice English. Dialect literature gives us a convincing portrayal of such people. We and our children respond to their sentiments without any desire to imitate their idiosyncrasies of speech. Surely such expressions of wholesome human natures are not "barbaric puerilities," but their natural mode of utterance, distinguishing them from better educated mortals. The virile personality of Natty Bumpo thrilled me as a child; his quaint forms of expression, instead of "larning" me bad grammar, only amused me and intensified my appreciation of the naturalness of his character. Shall we banish "Uncle Remus" from our fireside for fear that "the little boy" (and children of a larger growth) may become corrupted by his homely dialect? Must Joel Chandler Harris never appear in the pages of the Nation? Or, by extension, shall we expurgate from the works of the immortals the blundering Dogberry or the inimitable Mrs. Malaprop, because, forsooth, they murder the King's English? Coming home to classic Boston, near which the writer of the protest lives, must Lowell's poem of New England rural life, "The Courtin'," be interdicted on the ground that "the existence of such corruptions of English is merely a misfortune; their reproduction in the Nation is a calamity"?

So, Mr. Editor, as a reader of the Nation who believes that the use of your pages in presenting good dialect literature is not a "misuse," but the sane appreciation of a valuable form of literary expression, I make a plea for the Hoosier Poet and all good dialect writers whose prose and verse pulsate with human joys and sorrows. Continue to publish extracts from their writings for our delectation, and have no fear that "the gobbie-uns 'll git you, if you don't watch out!" L. G. PAINTER.

OPIUM SMOKING IN JAVA.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Opium smoking is the chief vice of the inhabitants of Java. The whole of the opium consumed in Java is manufactured by the Dutch Government of the island, at the government opium manufactory in Batavia. The profits are very large. Mark well that the importation of opium is entirely prohibited, and that no opium poppies are grown in Java, the poppy heads used in the manufacture being especially imported for this purpose by the Dutch Government from British India. It is therefore evident that, if the Government of Java could be induced, in the interests of humanity, to renounce its profits, and to close its opium manufactory, the practice of the vice in Java would cease at once.

AN EMINENT SOCIOLOGIST.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: News comes from Florence of the death of one of the most distinguished of Italian sociologists, Scipio Sighele.

He was born at Brescia in 1868, graduated at the University of Rome, and then resided for many years in the Trentino, that painfully Italian part of the Austrian Empire, whence his family came, and whence he was banished by the Austrian Government for asserting his ideals of political liberty. He was lecturer on criminal law at the University of Pisa, professor of criminal sociology at the University of Brussels, and member of many scientific and literary academies.

A lawyer by training, he became interested in the scientific study of criminology, then under the leadership of Lombroso, and with his accurate studies, particularly of crowds, he was soon recognized as a pioneer in what is termed collective psychology. In fact, his principal works are (I give here the French titles, because these books are better known in this country in their French translation) "La Foule criminelle," "Le Crime à deux," and "La Psychologie des sectes." In these books, besides scientific accuracy in the collecting and presenting of facts, we find a broad knowledge of literature, criticised from the psychological point of view by a man who was himself both scientist and artist. While investigating with painstaking erudition social evils and the character of crowds, he studied the individual, both in actual life and in the masterpieces of fiction. This is attested by such works as "Letteratura tragica" and "Nell' arte e nella scienza."

The foundation of his philosophy of government was that the psychology of collected individuals is far inferior to that of each individual taken separately. There is in this conclusion a suggestion of pessimism, particularly if it is applied to parliamentary government—a subject on which Sighele made a special study (see his essay entitled "Contro il parlamentarismo" and his latest book, just issued, "Morale privata e morale politica"). But he was, on the contrary, very optimistic. His constant theory was that the individual should be better educated, so that the crowd, the social gathering, and the political assembly might eventually be improved, and by their work in turn improve the individual. Thus in its scope his life's work had a background of ideal philanthropy.

Though his name will live chiefly on account of his scientific work, Scipio Sighele was popular in Italy largely for his political significance. As an exile of Austria, as a preacher of unflinching irredentism, and as one of the first to voice that nationalism which recently found glorious manifestation in the campaigns of Tripoli, Sighele was a kind of national hero. And his numerous contributions to the best magazines and dailies brought his ideas frequently before the public.

It is, indeed, to be regretted that a life so productive and so useful should be cut off at the age of forty-five. In his work in collective psychology Professor Sighele had an international reputation. In Italy his name remains as a symbol at once of a broad and studious mind dedicated to a lofty purpose, and of the highest ideals of patriotism.

COLOMBIA.

Colombia. By Phanor J. Eder. With 40 illustrations and 2 maps. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $3 net.

If there is one country in South America which has a definite claim on the intelligent sympathy and interest of the American people, it is the Republic of Colombia, and yet if there has been one country in South America about which it has been difficult to get accurate information, it is our neighbor across the Isthmus. To be sure, various travellers have given us some insight into its geography and the manners and customs of its people. Millican, the orchid hunter, wrote a capital account of his travels and adventures, but it was published more than twenty years ago, and is difficult to procure. Wirt Robinson, in his "Flying Trip to the Tropics," gave us a good picture of the Magdalena River and of the bird life that he encountered on his hasty trip. American Minister Scruggs, in writing "The Colombian and Venezuelan Republics," enabled us to see the civilized part of Colombia and the manners and customs of Bogota through the eyes of a diplomat. And Loraine Petre, in his "Republic of Colombia," gives a very fair account of that part of the country which can most easily be visited, and, in his "Simon Bolivar," a painstaking, minute study of the military side of her War of Independence. But there has been no book to which one could turn for accurate information and satisfactory description of the country as a whole.

At last we have in the present volume an adequate book on Colombia which it is a pleasure to welcome. No writer in Scribner's useful South American series has given evidence of knowing his country so intimately, thoroughly, and sympathetically as Mr. Eder. Although his work lacks the brilliant originality of Professor Denis's "Brazil," it takes very high rank in the series.

Mr. Eder has, to be sure, written frankly from the point of view of the mere business man. Historical and sociological material has been used only to give the necessary background. Nevertheless, the historical part of the book is well and thoughtfully written. Unlike Petre, whose work is marred by frequently expressed animosity against Santander, Mr. Eder rightly calls that remarkable man one of "the best type of public men South America has produced. Well versed in polities and jurisprudence, Santander was a constructive statesman who relied upon law, not force, for the maintenance of government, amply earning the title that has been bestowed on him, el hombre de las leyes—'the man of law.' He was ever a sincere patriot, subordinating his personal ambition to his country's welfare, and his public record has but few stains." We know all too little about this man, although his character and achievements really earned him a place alongside of Washington and Jefferson.

As a result of his three years in the Harvard Law School and of his own personal acquaintance with the mining laws of Colombia, Mr. Eder has been able to write an unusually good chapter on government and law. A clearer exposition of the laws of any South American republic has not appeared in any book which has come under the reviewer's notice during the last twelve years. It is brief, but very much to the point. There is a useful appendix giving the amendments to the Constitution adopted in 1910, but as Mr. Eder himself says, > the Colombians, a few exceptions apart, have never really understood, do not to-day understand, their own Constitution; . . . the Constitution has no vital effect upon the nation's life or laws; inner spirit it has none; and though there is much discussion over it, and to-day all political parties proclaim themselves "constitutional," that is, adherents in the main of the existing Constitution, yet a reading of it furnished us surprisingly little assistance in arriving at any complete understanding of the actual workings of the Government.

Mr. Eder admits that revolutions will occur, but he also contends that they will be less of a menace and less destructive to Colombia than a coal strike to Great Britain or a railway strike to the United States.

The author appears to belong to a family some of whose members have been in business in Colombia for half a century, chiefly in the rich Cauca Valley. This fact, while adding to Mr. Eder's qualifications for his task, has been the cause of two defects. The more serious is that he takes it for granted that his readers have a good general knowledge of South America. Of course, this leaves him free to make his book more informative for the well-prepared reader, and it is quite possible that the time has arrived when our knowledge of South American history and institutions should enable us to use more advanced handbooks. The second fault, not a serious one, is that Mr. Eder lays too much emphasis on the Cauca Valley. Yet he recognizes his natural prejudice for the part of the country where his family has lived, and he has tried, by consulting the best authorities, to do justice to those portions of Colombia with which he is not personally acquainted. His excuse for calling particular attention to "The Valley" is that the opening of the Panama Canal will benefit Cauca as much as, possibly more than, any other part of South America. Its seaport of Buenaventura, if ever properly developed and drained, has a great future.

Mr. Eder has not felt the necessity of discussing the way in which the Republic of Panama achieved its independence. At the same time, as he enjoys the rare distinction of being fond of both Colombia and the United States, his remarks on the present attitude of Colombians towards us are worthy of careful consideration. With the authority of intimate personal knowledge, he writes: "In spite of the lapse of so many years, the unsettled 'Panama question' is still a burning one in Colombia." Colombians "dread a Yankee attempt sooner or later to overpower South America, and believe their land to be the outpost which will be first attacked. They have already felt the talon of the Eagle; they have a hysterical dread that the voracious bird will again swoop down upon their country. Hysterical is the only word. Suspicion of the designs of the American Government is carried to absurd limits." In the word "hysterical" he has put his finger at the very core of the trouble. The question for the careful reader of his book to answer is, How far is it the duty of the United States to attempt to effect a cure for this hysteria? Unlike a recent magazine writer who would have us take from Panama her southern provinces and hand them back to Colombia—on the theory that two wrongs make a right—Mr. Eder offers no suggestions as to how we may help settle this burning question. He does, however, point out repeatedly the possibilities for enlarging Colombia's commerce and the opportunities for making investments in her mines, ranches, and plantations.

His friendliness to Colombia has not led him to overlook her faults. In criticising her economic policy he does not mince matters. Speaking of the Magdalena River, Colombia's chief highway, he says: "Its utility, actual or latent, is limited, and to have staked the early railroad-building energies of the nation, and largely its pecuniary resources, too, on establishing connection with this frail artery of trade without any serious attempt to improve its navigability, has been Folly, Waste, Crime." In fact, Colombian statesmen will find many unpalatable paragraphs. A current joke illustrating the character of some Colombian railways is worth repeating. Says one passenger to another, "We seem to be going more smoothly." "Yes," replies his friend, "we are off the track now."

The development of Colombia's natural resources is retarded on every side by lack of roads:

> Rich mines to which machinery cannot be taken except at frightful cost, forests of valuable timber too remote from the seas or navigable rivers to be available for international trade, agricultural lands that could supply a large share of the world's tropical products, did not the freights eat up the profits—these lie fallow and unworked. Dozens of articles that the country itself produces, prime necessities like salt, sugar, rice, flour, potatoes, are imported from abroad because that is cheaper, despite high duties, than transporting them from one part of the country to another. Roads and railroads are indeed the crying need.

If anything is needed to help the American reader to a sympathetic consideration of the stumbling-blocks that have lain in the way of Colombia's progress from the beginning, it is a few weeks' experience of travel in the central Andes.

On the other hand, Mr. Eder is able to testify:

> The resources of the country are daily developing, its income daily increasing, yet its national debt per capita remains one of the smallest of any of the American nations. There is scarcely a country in the world, therefore, which offers to the enterprising financier a better field for a large bank and loan venture, with a high and legitimate profit and a fair margin of safety.

This may sound, taken by itself, too sanguine, but Mr. Eder well knows the difficulties of carrying negotiations through to a successful termination. From personal experience he has found that the Colombian Government and people are "not easy to negotiate with." They cannot easily be made to perceive the standpoint of the foreign banker and investor. We are almost forced to the conclusion that Colombia does not at heart really desire foreign capital.

To those boosters of our foreign trade who are wont to say that if we make our goods satisfactory and can compete in regard to prices, we can sell our wares without difficulty, Mr. Eder replies: "How large a rôle anti-American feeling plays to the advantage of the European exporter it is impossible to estimate accurately: that it is enormous cannot be doubted." With regard to our own commercial travellers, it is a pleasure to learn that "the much-beridiculed, language-ignorant, 'dago'-despising, tobacco-chewing, grossly impolite type of Yankee 'hustler' is rapidly disappearing." At the same time it is discouraging to find that our manufacturers who ship goods to Colombia still ignore the first requirements of packing. They either make the package so heavy that the additional customs and freight charges ruin the consignee, or so flimsy that damage and breaking due to transshipments and mule-back journeys, and exposure to heat and wet, cause the goods to arrive in a state that is little likely to cause future orders.

At the risk of tiring the ordinary reader, Mr. Eder has ventured to give a considerable amount of space to carefully compiled data with regard to economic conditions that should prove of the greatest value to intending visitors, be they tourists, commercial travellers, or investors. Specific details are furnished in regard to the number of coffee plants that can be planted to the acre, the character and source of Colombia's exports, and the size and resources of her banks, laboriously compiled from annual reports and private sources of information.

A word must be said in regard to the photographs, which are not only well chosen, but, a far less common occurrence, are actually placed so as to illustrate the text. For some of the best, the author acknowledges his indebtedness to the recent expedition of the American Museum under the leadership of Frank Chapman. The publishers have not treated the book fairly in the map, which, a too faithful copy of Codazzi, is not up-to-date as regards railways, and, although giving conspicuous notice to some places long since defunct, actually fails to locate such important points as La Dorada and Nemocón. It would also make the Peruvians smile to see that their northern boundary is the Amazon. If only Colombia would undertake to govern the Putumayo as well as to claim it on the maps!

CURRENT FICTION.

The End of Her Honeymoon. By Mrs. Belloc Lowndes. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.

In "The Chink in the Armour" Mrs. Belloc Lowndes developed, somewhat laboriously, a story of crime and mystery. Here she does something of the same sort in a far better way. The plot is ingenious, but the reader does not feel that he is examining the merits of an intricate invention. The mystery itself absorbs him from the beginning. Here is the opening situation: A young pair arrive in Paris late one night, the last night of a three weeks' honeymoon. John Dampier is, like his wife, English by birth, but a painter who has lived long in Paris, and who now brings his bride to Paris as home.

It is an Exhibition year, and when they reach the hotel, they find that the landlady, though Dampier had written, has not suitable rooms for them. Rather than go elsewhere, they stay, the wife in a room adjoining that of their host and hostess, the Poulains, Dampier in some garret cubicle which is vaguely spoken of and which, of course, the young wife does not see. In the morning Dampier has disappeared. To the wife's amazement, the Poulains deny that he has been there at all. They assert that she has come there alone, and show a strong desire to be rid of her. Fortunately, there are certain fellow-inmates of the hotel to whom she can appeal—an American Senator, his daughter, and son.

The police are notified, the morgue is visited, the American and British consulates are appealed to. Finally, the Prefect of Police is interviewed, and as a result the house is searched. Nothing is found, and the outlook seems hopeless. By this time the younger American is in love with Mrs. Dampier, and believing that Dampier is dead, swears to discover the truth. The reader who guesses the answer before it is presented to him in black and white will be a clever person.

Betty Musgrave. By Mary Findlater. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.

Neither Scottish scenes, the description of some extraordinarily eccentric and diseased personalities, nor the interest of a simple thread of sentimental action, quite saves this book from colorlessness. Partly responsible are the small number of characters, and the highly subjective cast of the story. In the first chapter we are introduced to the only three personages of importance: Betty, daughter of a ruined house, her father dead, and her money gone; her mother, a vicious woman, addicted to drugs; and Oliver Lacy, the rather lackadaisical young hero. It requires no penetration to perceive that the action is to lie simply in Betty's struggles for a livelihood, her efforts to reform her mother or restrain her, and in Lacy's unexciting methods of love-making. In trying to inject a moral interest into this rather uninspiring course of events, the author has only succeeded in giving us too much psychology. The ending is long foreseen and conventional; the mother dies, a victim to her vices, and Betty and Oliver are quietly married. The only passages of merit are those describing the wholesome young girl in contrast with several distasteful and snobbish figures of the London society into which her family connections carry her, a "poor relation" of independent type.

The Dominie of Harlem. By Arnold Mulder. Chicago: A. C. McClurg & Co.

Dominies still exist in Harlem—but in a Harlem of the Middle West, a little settlement whose people have preserved the customs of the Fatherland and let the "Dutch of it" persist in their natures. To this conservative community came a new minister, the "Dominie," of the new generation who wished to "melt the snow" of prejudice and narrowness in Harlem. He began at once with a series of crimes. He went out canoeing, failed to ask after the health of the soul of his flock on meeting them, and laughed on Sunday. To cap it all, he eloped with the daughter of a man who had left the church in anger and had himself married by a Methodist preacher. Ultimately, his manhood overrode popular sentiment, melted the snow of his parishioners' hearts, and put him at the head of his headstrong community.

"The Dominie of Harlem" is a pretty tale, prettily done. To many readers it will be news to be told of Dutch peasants in twentieth-century America. Their squabbles, social and religious, their condemnation of the use of English as the worst of sins, their struggle against progress and colleges and fresh air, make a pleasant if not a startling narrative.

If You Touch Them They Vanish. By Gouverneur Morris. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.

Gouverneur Morris here returns to an earlier and pleasanter style. It is a sort of modern fairy tale, with a Poor—but rich—Boy for a hero, misused for all his millions, an old Irish nurse for a Fairy Godmother, a New York society girl who has lost her all in the vague machinations of finance for a Fairy Princess, and for a background a vast, sweeping valley of soaring rocks and billowing pine forests far up on the Canadian coast. To this private domain the Poor Boy retires when he is shunned by the world for an offence he never committed. His old nurse goes with him, the only human being who believes in him, and the only one whose face he will consent to see. Here in the wilderness the Poor Boy surrounds himself with a whole community of kindred spirits. He peoples it with all the sufferers of the world who have been wrongfully accused and imprisoned. With them he conducts great enterprises, develops his domain, establishes a commission government by three persons, a man, a woman, and a child—who must not be in any way related to the other members of the commission, lest the slipper should unduly influence affairs of state—builds houses, schools, and public edifices. But through it all he knows that, while he may talk to his friends, if he touches them they will vanish. How the old nurse brought a helper to the valley, and how in the end the Poor Boy found that they did not always vanish when you touched them, are things not to be set forth here. Mr. Morris has handled his difficult subject with a graceful touch.

PLATO'S LETTERS.

The Authorship of the Platonic Epistles. By R. Hackforth. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. $2 net.

The renewed controversy concerning the genuineness of the thirteen "Platonic" Epistles is of more than technical interest. It affects not only the availability of much attractive material for the historian of Greece, but our conception of Plato's character. It is no light thing to assume that Plato was capable of the silly mysticism of the second epistle, the scholastic pedantry and sophistic rhetoric of the third and others; the obscurities, affectations, and tasteless jests of the sixth; the disingenuousness of the thirteenth; the clumsy irrelevance and ponderous elaboration of Platonic formula in the philosophical digression in the seventh.

In the recent renewal of the debate all the apparatus of professional philology and an appalling lexicographical industry have been brought to bear upon a question which a really cultivated literary instinct ought to be able to decide by one attentive reading. Our own "cultivated literary instinct" rejects the letters peremptorily. But it is not easy to translate this inner light into constraining objective arguments. The ever-swelling philological literature of the controversy is largely concerned with the setting up and knocking down of men of straw. The genuineness of the letters can never be proved by showing that they contain no gross and palpable errors of history, and that in vocabulary and idiom they diverge less widely from the usage of Plato's later writings than the zeal of Karsten and other early objectors affirmed, or that they conform more or less closely to Isocratean precepts for the avoidance of hiatus. The errors and exaggerations on both sides cancel one another. We have seen no treatise on the subject from which we could not quote demonstrable misapprehensions of the text.

The broad grounds for the rejection of the epistles are simple. Their acceptance by antiquity hardly creates a presumption in their favor. Antiquity was uncritical in this matter and accepted hundreds of demonstrably spurious epistles. All but a few extremists admit that several of the "Platonic" collection are forgeries. The others, then, may be. We think they are. In the first place, there is no equal amount of Platonic text that is so tame, that contains so few really fine or beautiful sentences. Secondly, the entire writings of Plato probably present fewer "reminiscences" of notable and quotable Platonic passages than these letters. It is easy to misapprehend or confuse this issue. We are not speaking of the iteration and enforcement of fundamental Platonic principles, nor of the verbal repetition of idiom and formula, but of the allusive and scholastic literary reminiscences of famous Platonic passages which we do not find in Plato, and expect to find in a forger. These two broad considerations would suffice, in our opinion, to determine the question. More subjective, perhaps, are arguments drawn from our ideal of Plato's character. It is always possible to argue that the real Plato "gave himself away" in the letters. And it is not easy to refute those who choose to believe that the author of "The Republic," "Gorgias," and "Phædo" wrote letters of the "burn this" type, and had a private understanding with Dionysius that insincere letters of recommendation should begin with the polytheistic word θεοί. The ordinary lexicographical arguments, as we have said, prove little either way. A clever Platonizing rhetorician writing within a generation or two of Plato's death would be able to avoid gross errors of vocabulary. He would be more likely to betray himself in slight deviations from the older usage of ordinary words. We suspect that ἦθος, apparently in the sense of literary style, in the third epistle (316 A), is such a case: δῆλα μὲν ἑκάτερα ἔσται τοῖς τὸ ἐμὸν ἦθος δυναμένοις κρίνειν. Both the thought and the half-technical phrasing here seem to smack of Alexandrinism.

These introductory reflections have kept Mr. Hackforth's volume waiting too long, but have anticipated the substance of our criticism of it. Mr. Hackforth's conclusion is that iii, iv, vii, viii, and xiii are genuine; i, ii, v, vi, and xii spurious, and ix, x, and xi doubtful. In support of this judgment he reviews the letters seriatim, but by no means exhaustively, reaffirming the chief objections of German investigators to the epistles which he rejects and endeavoring to weaken the force of their arguments against those which he accepts.

He does not, so far as we have observed, anywhere meet the two main arguments on which we have rested the issue, unless the scanty collection of parallel passages within the dialogues in Appendix B is to be regarded as an answer to our condemnation of the epistles for excess of Platonic reminiscence.

His introduction gives a sufficient, though incomplete and narrowly technical, history of the "literature" of the controversy. It concludes with his own chief original contribution to the subject. Roeder, on the basis of the tabulation of 246 "rare Platonic words" occurring in the epistles, had affirmed a "general lexical affinity" between the epistles as a whole and Plato's later writings. Mr. Hackforth reduces Roeder's list from 246 to 126 by tables constructed from the special lexica for Thucydides, Xenophon, Demosthenes, Isocrates, the other orators, and Aristotle. Within this group of 126 he establishes a list of 38 "special words" occurring in Plato only in the later dialogues, and by the use of these two lists he finds that the lexical affinities with these dialogues of the epistles which he accepts are a few per cent. higher than those of the epistles which he rejects. This is an interesting illustration of the law that every "style-statistical" investigation only imposes a more laborious task on the next inquirer. We are unable to see that it proves anything else. And Mr. Hackforth's English common-sense constrains him to "face the fact" that no amount of affinity can afford conclusive proof of Platonic authorship. It can only indicate that the letters in question "either are the works of Plato, or the Forger has been very skilful"—even so, more skilful, that is, than the forger of other letters, a conclusion with which we have no quarrel.

The Loss of Normandy (1189-1204): Studies in the History of the Angevin Empire. By F. M. Powicke, M.A. Manchester: University Press; New York: Longmans, Green & Co. $5 net.

In the general history of European politics the Normans of the eleventh and twelfth centuries hold a position of no small importance. As conquerors they made their influence felt from Ireland to the Mediterranean; as organizers they established in England and in Sicily the first modern states in Western Europe, both well in advance of their contemporaries in economic and military strength and in the precocious vigor of their fiscal and administrative systems. While the dominant element in these countries was Norman and ruled with all the stern masterfulness of the Norman character, it was quick to assimilate and transmit the culture and institutions of others, and much of the significance of the Normans lies in their work as intermediaries. Whatever their Scandinavian inheritance may have been, it is now well understood that the conquerors of England had become Frenchmen long before the Battle of Hastings, and the significance of the Conquest lies largely in the connections then established with the culture and law of northern France, a fact of which the English language is a perennial reminder.

Oddly enough, Normandy, especially on its institutional side, has received little attention from English historians, who have been slow to admit the Continental origin of fundamental institutions like the jury and to grasp the larger implications of Norman history. Freeman's elaborate "History of the Norman Conquest" is little more than a political narrative, written with little real understanding of underlying conditions on either side of the Channel; his "big Sicily" ends with the Greeks, his "little Sicily" with the Romans. French scholars have done more, but their special studies have generally failed to make clear the international relations of their subject. The truth is that the history of Normandy is a difficult field of study, largely because of the paucity of original material. There is no parallel to the Domesday survey or the Anglo-Saxon lawbooks, and the scattered fragments of the exchequer rolls make a sorry showing as compared with the pipe rolls and the legal treatises of Plantagenet England. The ore does not lie on the surface, and requires patient and even ingenious search.

Under these circumstances a work like Professor Powicke's, already foreshadowed by various special articles, deserves a warm welcome. He sees his subject broadly, is abreast of recent investigation, both in France and England, and writes with point and vigor. Although the events of the reigns of Richard and John occupy five chapters, the book is not so much a narrative of the separation of Normandy from England, as a series of studies concerning the Angevin empire, viewed as the most advanced and self-sufficient country in Europe during the early years of the thirteenth century, and as thus illustrating in an especial degree the characteristics of a mediæval state. There are here set forth for the first time, at least in English, the geographical basis of the wide-reaching empire of Henry II and his sons, the common elements in its administration, and the nature of the ducal government in Normandy, the empire's origin and centre. The collapse of Angevin power is then traced through the campaigns of Richard and John to the organization of the newly acquired domains by Philip Augustus, while the appendix throws light on the vexed question of the condemnation of John by the court of peers. The most original part of the work is probably the portion which uses the operations in Normandy to illustrate the workings of a mediæval state in time of war. Based on the exchequer rolls of 1180-1203 and the chancery enrolments of John's early years, these chapters show forth the concrete detail of military and fiscal affairs as we could never learn it from the chroniclers. We see how in Normandy, a land of châtellenies rather than of shires, the ducal castle and its adjacent demesne were the real unit of administration, and we get a vivid notion of castle life in peace and in war. We can follow item by item the many thousand pounds which went to the making of Château Gaillard, where Richard utilized the knowledge of Syrian fortifications which he had gained on his crusade, and we can see at their work the Saracen mercenaries and Frankish artillerymen whom he brought back from the East. The same invaluable sources show us the reckless finance of an age which knew no budget and was just discovering how easy it was to borrow.

On the results of the Norman wars Professor Powicke can hardly be expected to say anything very new. The division of the baronage, here traced out in an appendix of much interest to genealogists, formed the law of treason and the law of aliens; the loss of the continental domains developed English nationality and prepared the way for the Great Charter. For France the great fact was, of course, its geographical unification and the enlargement of the royal power. Some direct influence was probably exerted by the more advanced and more highly centralized Norman system upon the judicial and fiscal departments of the Capetian government, but the exact process is not yet understood, and the problem is not here raised. The important thing is to "remind ourselves that when the Normans became French they did a great deal more than bring their national epic to a close. They permitted the English once more to become a nation, and they established the French state for all time." A great people can hardly ask a more glorious end for its history.

The Life of Lyman Trumbull. By Horace White. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co. $3 net.

The life of Lyman Trumbull offers some difficulties for the biographer. His long career in Congress can, of course, be traced with accuracy through various series of official documents. Outside of his public utterances, however, and the record of his public activities, material of a personal nature is scanty. Of the several thousand letters preserved among his papers, and now in the Library of Congress, nearly all are the work of his correspondents; for of his own letters he rarely kept copies, and few of value seem to have been preserved by his friends. On the other hand, Trumbull's career identified him so closely with epoch-making events in our national history, that the biographer who essays to give an adequate account of his influence or achievements must either narrate much history of a general rather than personal nature, or else assume that the reader himself knows that history exceptionally well. Opinions will differ regarding the method which Mr. White has pursued. He has certainly written a good many pages in which Trumbull does not appear at all, and his use of the Trumbull letters suggests that the importance of the collection may not be in proportion to its bulk; but he at least makes clear throughout the part which Trumbull played, and adds to American political biography a notable and welcome contribution.

Trumbull's rise to national prominence was rapid. From the moment when, in 1855, he entered Congress as a Senator from Illinois, the course of events brought him into opposition to the slavery forces and to Douglas, his senior colleague; and although he was at one with Douglas in opposing the Lecompton Constitution, he had no sympathy whatever for Douglas's attitude of indifference to the ultimate fate of slavery itself. His speech in opposition to the Crittenden compromise was one of the strongest which that futile proposition elicited. On the other hand, his friendship for Lincoln did not blind him to Lincoln's subserviency to political interests, or to the weaknesses of Lincoln's military policy. Of the Cameron scandal, an ineradicable blot on Lincoln's Administration, and of the essential untruthfulness of Lincoln in the matter of the appointment of Harvey to the Portuguese mission, Mr. White gives an account which spares neither Lincoln nor Seward. Very interesting, too, is Trumbull's own account of his visit to Bull Run, and of the panic and stampede of the Union troops. The treatment of a telegram which Trumbull sent to his wife on July 22, 1861, is a vivid reminder of the devious ways of military censorship. Trumbull wrote: "The battle resulted unfavorably to our cause." What Mrs. Trumbull received read: "I came from near the battlefield last night. It was a desperately bloody fight."

Of the important measures which Trumbull had large share in framing, the first was the Confiscation Act of August 6, 1861. Mr. White is in error in saying, in his first mention of the act (p. 168), that it "did not confiscate any other than slave property," unless he has in mind the actual effect of the act rather than its terms; for the first section of the act expressly provides for the confiscation of all property used for insurrectionary purposes. The provisions are correctly summarized later (p. 173). A similar inadvertence occurs in the discussion of the Emancipation Proclamation (p. 222). Mr. White writes:

> Moreover, if the President had legal authority to issue the proclamation, then he, or a successor in office, could revoke it. . . . The proclamation did not purport to rest upon any constitutional power, but upon war powers solely.

The first of these statements implies, apparently, that the President could by proclamation reinslave those whom by proclamation he had set free: a doctrine directly opposed to the famous ruling decision of Lord Mansfield in the Somerset case. The second statement is true, in a sense, of the preliminary proclamation of September, 1862; but the Emancipation Proclamation itself, of January 1, 1863—the only one, of course, which actually had effect—affirms that the action of the President is "warranted by the Constitution upon military necessity."

The Freedmen's Bureau and Civil Rights bills of 1866 were also largely Trumbull's work; and while the former failed to pass over Johnson's veto, the latter, though vetoed also, became law. The veto of the Civil Rights bill was, for Trumbull, the parting of the ways. Hitherto he had supported Johnson, but the action of the President seemed to him to endanger the freedom of the negroes, and he not only devoted himself to passing the bill over the veto, but in the Congressional campaign of 1866 was the leading figure on the Republican side (pp. 273, 277). His authorship of the Thirteenth Amendment, in force in 1865, would of itself have made him a national figure, and he did not intend that the results which the amendment had achieved, or the powers of enforcement which he believed had been secured to Congress under its second section, should be put in jeopardy. Yet he was no blind follower of his party, and in the impeachment of Johnson he met the supreme test of courage by voting, with six other Republicans, for acquittal.

Of the more conspicuous events of Trumbull's subsequent career—his opposition to the Ku Klux act, his insistence upon the investigation of the scandals of Grant's Administration, his share in the Liberal Republican movement of 1872, and his appearance as one of the counsel for Tilden in 1877—Mr. White gives a circumstantial and sympathetic account. No recent book of American political biography has had the advantage of such intimate personal contact by the author with the events and personages described. In the long list of writings through which Mr. White has recorded or interpreted the history of his time, this his latest book will hold, we are confident, a notable place.

The Principles of Judicial Proof. By John Henry Wigmore. Boston: Little, Brown & Co. $6 net.

If any one is entitled to try an experiment in teaching the law of evidence, it is the author, or, as he modestly styles himself, the compiler, of this book. He has studied this branch of the law long and thoroughly. He has taught it many years. He has published a monumental treatise, under the title of "A System of Evidence in Trials at Common Law," and has compiled a huge collection of cases on evidence for classroom use. Yet whether any one is entitled to try the experiment made in this volume is a question upon which teachers and students of law will differ. Evidence is a topic which every member of a law-school class feels that he must study, even when it is not a prescribed course in the curriculum. It generally is, and ought always to be, a major course, in point of time allotment. If an entirely novel addition is to be made to this course it must obtain a still larger allotment of time at the expense of other courses, or the time heretofore given to the topic as now taught must be shortened.

Even Professor Wigmore is not very confident that his experiment will be successful. While he does not hesitate to assert that "there must be a probative science," he admits that "the science may as yet be imperfectly formulated or even incapable of formulation." If it is incapable of formulation, ought the entire body of law students to be forced to buy an expensive law book, and spend one-quarter of the time available for an important topic in the chase of what may turn out to be an ignis fatuus?

Again, granting that the experiment is justifiable, the further question arises, ought it to be made as a preliminary to the course in evidence or as a supplement to it? Now, the object of the experiment is to train the advocate in the art of "contentious persuasion," and to train the judge in the correct application of the scientific principles of judicial proof. But, unless the existing rules governing the admissibility of evidence are to be ignored, or to be subjected to radical modifications, it should seem that a knowledge of those rules should precede a study of the present volume. An advocate does not enter upon his task of persuading the jury or the court, nor does a judge render a decision, until the evidence is all in. And what evidence is in must always depend upon the rules of admissibility. Unless, therefore, this experimental study of the science of proof has for one of its main purposes the abrogation or radical modification of the existing rules of admissibility, it ought, we submit, to supplement the present course in evidence.

An examination of the material reprinted in the volume before us leads to the same conclusion. Part iii, the author assures us, "represents the ultimate and most difficult aspect of the principles of proof"; namely, the method of solving a complex mass of evidence in contentious litigation, of determining why "a total mass of evidence does or should persuade us to a given conclusion." But every case which is reprinted in this part of the volume, as a problem for the student's consideration, furnishes only the evidence which was deemed admissible under existing rules. The problem presented is not how the case ought to have been tried; not what evidence ought to have been admitted, but, after all the witnesses had been examined and all rulings upon the admissibility of evidence had been made, what should have been the decision of the jurors, or of the court, if the scientific principles of proof were properly applied.

A course in which such problems are to be dealt with ought to supplement, not to precede, the ordinary course in evidence. If Professor Wigmore's experiment were made with a select class of graduate students while actively engaged in legal practice, it would be extremely interesting, and its results would be valuable.

Notes

Holt will bring out next week I. M. Rubinow's "Social Insurance," and "Statistical Averages," by Frank Zizek.

On Friday Putnams issue "The Old Boston Post Road," by Stephen Jenkins; "My Beloved South," by Mrs. T. P. O'Connor; an illustrated edition of Thomas Hardy's "Under the Greenwood Tree," and "Memoirs of Rt. Hon. Henry Labouchere, M.P., by Algar Labouchere Thorold.

Longmans, Green & Company have in preparation: "Royal Spain of To-day," by Tryphosa Bates Batcheller; "Lord Lyons, a Record of British Diplomacy," two volumes, by Lord Newton; "Life and Letters of George Villiers, Fourth Earl of Clarendon," two volumes, by Sir Herbert Maxwell; "The Life of William Pitt, Earl of Chatham," two volumes, by Basil Williams; "My Art and My Friends," the reminiscences of Sir Frederic H. Cowen; "Shakespeare's Stories," by Constance and Mary Maud; "Clio, a Muse, and Other Essays, Literary and Pedestrian," by G. M. Trevelyan; "English Prose, a Series of Related Essays for the Discussion and Practice of the Art of Writing," selected and edited by F. W. Roe and G. R. Elliott; "The Vices of Virtues and Other Vagaries," by the author of "The Life of a Prig"; "The Development of English Theology in the Nineteenth Century (1800-1860)," by the Rev. Vernon F. Storr; "The Church in Rome in the First Century, Being the Bampton Lectures for 1913," by the Rev. George Edmundson; "Churches in the Modern State," by John Neville Figgis; "Some Loose Stones, Being a Consideration of Certain Tendencies in Modern Theology, Illustrated by References to the Book Called 'Foundations,'" by the Rev. R. A. Knox; "The World's Redemption," by C. E. Rolt, and "Memories of a Soldier's Life," by Sir H. M. Bengough.

"The Collected Papers of Henry Sweet," edited by H. S. Wyld, will be published shortly by the Oxford University Press. The volume contains papers written by Professor Sweet in a period of more than thirty years. All are philological except a long essay on Shelley's nature poetry read to the Shelley Society, but never published. A large part of the book is devoted to phonetics.

In January Mr. G. K. Chesterton's new novel, "The Flying Inn," will be published simultaneously in England and this country. John Lane Company will issue it in America.

"General William Booth Enters into Heaven" is the title-poem of a volume of verse by Nicholas Vachel Lindsay which Mitchell Kennerley brings out this week.

"Gruss aus Deutschland" is the title of a reader for high schools and entering classes at college which is about to appear in Heath's Modern Language series. The author is Professor Holzwarth, of Smith College.

Mr. Leon H. Vincent has brought together a dozen literary sketches which he publishes under the appropriate title of "Dandies and Men of Letters" (Houghton Mifflin). The subjects run from the pure dandy, such as Beau Brummell, to a great poet, such as Lord Byron—although Mr. Vincent deals almost exclusively with the social side of Byron's life. The "Noble Poet" is also rightly included in this collection for the sentiment, sincere enough, with which the present sketch of him opens: "I like the Dandies; they were always very civil to me, though in general they disliked literary people." But Mr. Vincent is more amusing when he deals with lesser men, such as Rogers or Charles Kirkpatrick Sharpe, where the cynicism of the subject lends savor to his own wit. "The Ancient of St. James's Place," he writes of the former, "was not to be put down by trifles, such as being run over or robbed. He wore a grim and sardonic air as of one who intended to see all his coevals off the stage of life, and marvelled a little at their impudence in delaying to make an exit. . . . Writing from Woburn in December, 1849, Milnes says, 'Rogers has been here—very cross and very much petted. He stumps about most wonderfully, and has lately had the gratification of the deaths of several old people younger than himself.'" Among the other sketches are Thomas Moore, Peacock, Disraeli, and Henry Crabb Robinson. There are portraits and the printing is excellent.

Richard G. Badger, of Boston, has gathered nine of James Russell Lowell's essay-reviews into a volume which he publishes as "The Round Table." The books reviewed range in date from "The Works of Walter Savage Landor," published in 1846, to the third volume of Palfrey's "History of New England During the Stuart Dynasty," in 1864. Other titles are "Nationalism in Literature" (suggested by Longfellow's "Kavanaugh"), Thoreau's "Week on the Concord and Merrimack Rivers," "Elsie Venner," "The Marble Faun," "Disraeli as a Novelist," "The New Timon" (which Lowell cleverly attributed to Bulwer, the real author), and "Browning's Plays and Poems." Some of the work is good, as, for example, this characteristic passage on the influence of the country schoolhouse, suggested by Palfrey's "New England":

> Passing through some Massachusetts village, perhaps at a distance from any house, it may be in the midst of a piece of woods where four roads meet, one may sometimes even yet see a small, square, one-story building, whose use would not be long doubtful. It is summer, and the flickering shadows of forest leaves dapple the roof of the little porch, whose door stands wide, and shows, hanging on either hand, rows of straw hats and bonnets, that look as if they had done good service. As you pass the open windows, you hear whole platoons of high-pitched voices, discharging words of two or three syllables with wonderful precision and unanimity. Then there is a pause, and the voice of the officer in command is heard reproving some raw recruit whose vocal musket hung fire. Then the drill of the small infantry begins anew. . . .
> Now, this building, and others like it, were an original kind of fortification invented by the founders of New England. They are the martello-towers that protect our coast. This was the great discovery of our Puritan forefathers. . . . The opening of the first grammar-school was the opening of the first trench against monopoly in church and state.

That is the mature Lowell; but it cannot be said that most of these essays add to his reputation as a critic. They are, in simple truth, burdened with a great deal of smart and rather empty moralizing, through which runs a deafening fusillade of similes and metaphors. The clever metaphor was always Lowell's temptation, but in these pages his weakness is a vice. The publisher of the volume, with the exception of one footnote, gives no indication of the source of these essays.

The little book of "The Roadmender," half autobiography under a quaint allegorical disguise, half musings on the beauty of the world in mystical religious vein, was first published in 1902, and in the eleven years since then, without any puffing or adventitious aids, has made its way into the mind and heart of all lovers of the fine and precious in letters. It was known almost from the beginning that "Michael Fairless" was only a pen-name under which the author, Margaret Fairless Barber in real life, chose to disguise herself, and conjecture was soon rife as to her character and life. She wished to remain unknown, but her friends have rightly concluded that, if the world was to speak of her at all, she would have preferred to have the exact truth spoken. For that reason her sister, Mrs. A. M. Haggard, and one of the friends into whose family she was adopted and who cared for her in her illness, William Scott Palmer (M. E. Dowson), have now told the simple story of her years in a slender volume entitled "Michael Fairless, Her Life and Writings" (Dutton). We shall not attempt here to retell that narrative, for those who have read "The Roadmender" and "The Gathering of Brother Hilarius" will wish to go to the book itself. It is all in good taste, and might almost be a part of Michael Fairless's own notes, though without the last refinement of art which was a part of her nature. We might perhaps have been better satisfied, too, if a few of the trivial details of her childhood in her Yorkshire home were omitted, and more were told of her mature life before she was cast down on her "mattress prison." She died in 1901, in her thirty-third year, indomitable in her joy, and a watcher of things beautiful until the very end.

Putnams have issued a handsome volume in "Poetry of Heroism," selected and edited by John and Jean Lang, with sixteen drawings in color by W. Rainey. The compilers of this anthology have attempted to furnish in verse a chronological history of the British nation. Solemnly introduced by "God Save the King," the scheme begins with Cowper's "Boadicea" and extends to Kipling's ballads of the Empire and to recent songs of Canada, South Africa, and Australia. Most of the pieces one looks for are included, but occasional embarrassment has been caused, the preface explains, by the restrictions of copyright. Are these responsible for the omission of Rossetti's "White Ship"? The editors provide frequent introductions, and a glossary of difficult words in the case of early English and Scotch selections.

It is seldom that an account of a great building intended for the casual reader is as adequate as the volume on "Westminster Abbey," by W. J. Loftie (Lippincott). Picturesquely he leads the reader through the Abbey and its environs at the varied epochs of its history, tracing its growth as a building, and alluding pleasantly to the persons connected with it and to the great scenes enacted in it. The latter half of the volume describes with humorous and anecdotal touches the Triforium with its muniments and its "wax-figgers"; the Poets' Corner and Chapter House; the heraldry, the monuments, the epitaphs, and the monastic and collegiate buildings grouped at various times round the Abbey proper. Mr. Loftie makes no pretence of adding anything to our knowledge of the building or of its history, and commits occasionally rather strange errors, but he is to be commended for accomplishing his task without an unnecessary profusion of architectural terms or of historical dates and names, and without lapsing into the guidebook style, of which we have already so many terrifying examples.

"Sketchy" would be a more accurate word than "short" for the title of Benjamin Griffith Brawley's "A Short History of the American Negro" (Macmillan). Even so, the book is readable for two-thirds of its 230 pages, and that portion of it is adapted by its straightforward style as well as by its assembling of leading facts for use as a textbook. But the latter part of the volume has a characteristic that is unfortunately common in books dealing with the negro and written from a strongly sympathetic point of view, namely, the glorification of individuals of the race who have achieved unusual success. Instead of a scholarly survey of the progress of the negro since slavery, we find a sentimental "Who's Who."

After a few perfunctory and inadequate chapters on the Bulgarian people and their history, Mr. John MacDonald, in "Czar Ferdinand and his People" (Stokes), gives a useful and entertaining account of the personality of the present ruler of Bulgaria and a narrative of the chief events of his reign. The tone is that of mild panegyric; the author constantly praises the tactful, patient, and persistent policy by means of which Ferdinand raised himself from the position of a prince tributary to Turkey, and, unrecognized by the great Powers of Europe, to that of an independent monarch, the head of a powerful army and the leading spirit in the victorious Balkan alliance. The climax of Ferdinand's career was the capture of Adrianople on March 28, 1913. Soon after that date this volume was apparently completed. Its story of progress, prosperity, and triumph reads strangely at the present time, when Bulgaria, weak and exhausted, has been stripped of nearly all the fruits of her victories. The only hint of coming disaster in Mr. MacDonald's book is its concluding sentence: "The League, which, it was hoped, would develop into a permanent, pacific Confederation, shows symptoms of a revival of the race hatreds and antagonisms that in the past made the Serbs and the Bulgars the Turk's easy prey."

In the present taste for horror our dramatists may discover sources for popular plays in M. Georges Soulié's "Strange Stories from the Lodge of Leisures" (Houghton Mifflin), translated from the Chinese. Their author lived in the seventeenth century—not the eighteenth, as the translator informs us—and occupies a position as a stylist and raconteur somewhat resembling La Fontaine's in France. M. Soulié does not tell us in his introduction that about half of the tales of the "Liao Chai" collection, from which he has selected twenty-five, were translated thirty-three years ago by Professor Giles under the title of "Strange Stories from a Chinese Studio." He has epitomized rather than translated them, "it being impossible," in his opinion, "for a Westerner to retain all the long and useless talking, all the repetitions that Chinese writing and Chinese taste are equally fond of." On the other hand, it must be added that the art of the Chinese story-teller lies so largely in his wealth of metaphor and in his leisurely approach to a climax that the fragment of charm which may remain in a careful translation evaporates entirely in a paraphrase. There are, however, some pleasant conceits to be found in these weird tales, such as that of the man who became so friendly with a judge from the under world as to get from him a new heart (the seat of intelligence) and procure a comely face for his wife. For the most part the themes deal with Taoist devilry, ghosts, vampires, and the like; but from all of them one gains glimpses of the daily life and ideas of the Chinese which seldom appear in books written about them by foreigners. The Buddhist theory of metempsychosis offers a range to the imagination that rather staggers the Western mind, though it presents complications highly alluring to the Oriental. Besides this, is the conception of the over soul and the under soul after death, the former ranging through the universe and assuming various shapes, the latter able to animate the corpse and work havoc among human beings. On the whole, the accepted conventions allow the story-teller more startling situations and greater variety of interest than can be found within the limits of realism imposed by custom upon the fiction of the West.

The pleasantest thing about Mr. C. S. Olcott's "Country of Sir Walter Scott" (Houghton Mifflin) is the feeling that anybody, and anybody's wife, can in these troubled days be so deep in the lore of the magician whose spell for so many has been broken by more modern appeals to the emotions. In preparation for his pilgrimage Mr. Olcott made a careful study of all Scott's poems and novels, and in following him on his tour through Scotland and England one has the assurance of being in the hands of a well-informed guide. A good deal of human interest is mingled with the description of places, and the photographic illustrations are well taken and clearly reproduced. The book can be recommended as a good one in its kind.

To follow the winding course of the Seine in a trim little steam yacht must be a pleasant and restful way of spending a holiday. Sir Edward Thorpe gives an account of such a journey in "The Seine from Havre to Paris" (Macmillan). Two opening chapters, dealing with The Hydrography of the Seine and The Seine as a Waterway, are interesting in themselves and would be of considerable value to any wanderer, not inoculated with the speed virus, who cared to emulate the author's sensible example. Excellent sectional charts of the river are appended, and throughout there is careful information concerning lights, locks, anchorage, and other nautical matters. Sir Edward's description of the charming towns and villages, castles and abbeys, by which the Seine flows, is sympathetic and readable, but one who follows Mr. Percy Dearmer through the "Highways and Byways" of Normandy does so inevitably haud passibus æquis. "The "comic relief" in the way of little adventures that happened to the party on the yacht does not impress the candid stranger as particularly uproarious, and, since the book is intended for general circulation, these touches might have been omitted without eclipsing the gayety of nations.

In "With the Russian Pilgrims to Jerusalem" (Macmillan), Mr. Stephen Graham writes with full sympathy for the point of view of the devout, simple-minded, credulous peasants whose companion he became on the trip by boat from Constantinople to Jaffa and thence on foot to the holy places. He does not share their faith in the coarse frauds shown to them, but admires the spirit behind it: for him "true religion takes its rise out of mystery, and not out of miracle" (p. 286). He is not seriously repelled even by the "gospel of stupidity" preached by the strange fanatic monk, Father Yevgeny, on board the crowded, filthy pilgrim vessel. His tone throughout the book is indicated by the opening words of his preface: "The journey of the Russian peasants to Jerusalem has never been described before in any language, not even in Russian. Yet it is the most significant thing in the Russian life of to-day. In the story lies a great national epic." With a genuinely successful effort to catch the spirit of the most unintellectual among the great Christian churches, Mr. Graham unites a winning literary style. "Dear old Dyadya" and "Abraham, the Eternal Pilgrim" are living figures in his book, whether or not the reader shares the author's opinion of them. The description of the baptism in the Jordan is masterly in its quiet, dignified feeling, coupled with a frank recognition of the external grotesqueness of the scene. The volume is illustrated with excellent photographs taken by the author.

In the six neat octavo volumes of their series of "Tabulæ in Usum Schoiarum," soon to be followed by others, Marcus & Weber, of Bonn, make it possible for every one interested in Greece, Rome, and mediæval and Renaissance Europe to form his own library of facsimiles. At a cost of six marks per volume (except for No. 6) one can possess the cream of the great collections which are too expensive for even most college libraries. The publishers and editors are to be congratulated on the excellent quality of the reproductions, the judicious choice of subjects, and the high standard of the accompanying letter-press and bibliographies. In Vol. I, the editors have drawn upon the Greek MSS. of the Vatican for a connected series of facsimiles beginning with the Codex Vaticanus (one of the oldest Bible MSS.), and the venerable Dio Cassius, and terminating with several dated MSS. of the Renaissance. South Italian monasteries are well represented. Vol. II forms an admirable introduction to the new science of papyrology. It includes the oldest literary papyrus, Timotheus's "Persians," and the marriage contract of 311 B. C.; the only original yet discovered of an Egyptian Governor's edict; several ostraca; a good wax tablet; the oldest fragment of a parchment codex of any Greek classic; a leaf of Euripides's lost "Cretans," of the second century of our era; and many dated business documents and letters, with several literary fragments, especially of Homer.

Vol. III begins with reproductions of five Virgil MSS. and of the Bembine Terence. Among the other MSS. may be specially mentioned the famous palimpsest of Cicero's "De Republica," the Lateran Livy, the Latin-Arabic New Testament fragment of Sigüenza, and interesting Humanistic MSS. from 800 on. Almost all are accurately dated. No. IV is especially valuable. The early inscriptions, from the Lapis Niger on, are well represented. The bulk of the plates reproduce the walls of the Galleria Lapidaria of the Vatican; the reviewer has for years used his own photographs of these very inscriptions for classroom instruction, and found them most satisfactory material. Among the other plates are two of the ancient map of Rome, the Forma Urbis; the famous Damasus inscription, and fourteen of mediæval and Renaissance inscriptions, largely dated; several are of interest to the art student, particularly the beautiful photograph of the tomb of Nicholas V. Vol. V contains specimens of the handwriting of Erasmus, Pirkheimer, Luther, Melanchthon, Zwingli, Calvin, and a host of other distinguished men of the sixteenth century—indispensable to the student of the history and literature of that period. Vol. VI is the most profusely and beautifully illustrated of the Tabulæ, and of great general interest. The plates open with the Gizeh portrait statues in the Boston Museum of Fine Arts; Deibrück utilizes several other statues and busts in American collections, and the Copenhagen Glyptothek gives him some of his handsomest subjects. Of special interest or beauty are the Teje and Amenophis II of Berlin; the Turin Rameses II; the Takuschit at Athens; the Boston Menander; the Harvard Amastris (?); several busts of stylish Roman ladies, and three or four painted portraits. The last five plates are beautiful facsimiles of Greek and Roman portraits on gems and coins; the cameos are particularly remarkable.

The twenty-five pages of bibliography which follow the one hundred and sixty-five pages of text in the "Life and Writings of Maurice Maeterlinck," by Jethro Bithell, are quite correct in their suggestion that the virtue of the text itself is mainly bibliographical. The author shows a creditably wide acquaintance with recent French, Belgian, and German works, but with the indications of the whereabouts of various books and articles in these languages and in English, his capacity for service is virtually exhausted. The criticism is the embarrassed and haphazard criticism of the unpracticed man, unfurnished either with vivid personal impressions or with any fixed method in the appropriation and assimilation of materials supplied by others. Some of the judgments are naïve. One may respect the real imaginative power exhibited in works like "Les Aveugles" and "L'Intruse," and yet be surprised to see them brandished over Lessing's head in triumphant refutation of his dictum that no man can write a good tragedy before thirty. For these deficiencies in matter the style offers meagre compensations. The author, who is nothing if not contemporaneous, feels the full constraint of the modern obligation to be easy, and the injection of sociable parentheses into sentences not too shapely at the outset is carried out with unflinching perseverance. What the cult of vividness has in store for us when it shall have wrought its pure and perfect work among its less enlightened votaries may be inferred from the following comment on "Aglavaine et Sélysette": "What Maeterlinck has contributed to the problem is that he makes the two women love each other as well as the man they sandwich." (Published by Walter Scott.)

It is to be regretted that George L. Clark's "Silas Deane: A Connecticut Leader in the American Revolution" (Putnam) should not have been written with less partisan fervor and more scholarly thoroughness. Mr. Clark appears to have used the well-known printed collections of Deane papers and a few other standard works; but the particular sources of extracts and statements of fact are nowhere indicated and the documents are in many cases so carelessly and inaccurately quoted as to throw doubt upon the quality of the entire work. Of the main facts of Deane's life, Mr. Clark gives a readable account, though one marred by frequent inelegance of language and occasional repetition. His heated partisanship, however, joined to sneers at those of Deane's contemporaries who distrusted or opposed him, overtops the mark, and will do little more, we fear, than confirm the opinions of such as are already convinced. The crucial test of Deane's career is not that he exceeded his instructions, for his instructions were vague and scanty enough to leave him pretty much to his own discretion; or that his accounts were in confusion, for his transactions were of necessity devious, and he had no time to put his papers in order when recalled by Congress; or that he was believed to have used his office for private gain or to have accepted later an English bribe, for his long years of poverty negative such an assumption. What brought upon him obloquy and contempt was the fact that, in a moment of disappointment, despondency, and chagrin, he lost faith in the American cause and wrote in favor of reconciliation with Great Britain. For that, far removed as it might be from treason, there was no forgiveness. Mr. Clark's defence is that Deane's discouragement, and his weakness in yielding to it, were not greater than Elijah's, or John the Baptist's, or Savonarola's, or Jerome of Prague's, or Luther's. We cannot think the argument convincing, even when supported by such startling illustrations.

Grimmelshausen's "Simplicissimus" is one of the most remarkable books produced in Germany in the seventeenth century. It is now for the first time translated into English (Dutton). The translator, or editor, who signs himself A. T. S. G., reveals in the preface singular views as to the history of German literature, saying, for example, that there is little reflecting the spirit of the German people "to be discovered in the prose romances which appeared between the time of Grimmelshausen and that of Jean Paul Richter. But the influence of the latter was completely swept away in the torrent of idealism by which the fictions of the idolized Goethe and his followers were characterized, and his domestic realism has only of late made its reappearance in disquieting and sordid forms." What is said of Grimmelshausen is true enough, though it takes no account of German scholarship since 1877. The important matter is, however, that the translation, in somewhat archaic but fluent English, is accurate and idiomatic. The publishers have given the book, in paper, print, and binding, a pleasant suggestion of previous generations.

With "Dante and the Mystics" (Dutton) Mr. E. G. Gardner adds another excellent study to those he has already devoted to the great Italian poet-apostle. In this book he surveys the writings of the early Christian and mediæval mystics, from St. Augustine and Dionysius to Ubertino da Casale and the Mechthilds of Magdeburg and Hackeborn, and cites their many anticipations of essential doctrines and particular conceptions of the "Divine Comedy." The quotations have for the most part been adduced before, but they have never before been brought into a collection so well ordered and so illuminating. Mediæval mysticism takes two principal forms. One is the religious experience described by St. Catherine of Siena, known as the spiritual espousals of the soul with Christ. The other is an intellectual anticipation of the vision of the Divine Essence, as in the momentum intelligentiæ after which St. Augustine and St. Monica sighed. Dante's mysticism is for the most part of the latter type, but his sympathy with the experiences of emotional mysticism is none the less strong and constant. Several of Mr. Gardner's own suggestions are very interesting. The colle of the first Inferno is, he thinks, Richard of St. Victor's mountain of the knowledge of self. On the basis of Richard's interpretation of Leah, Mr. Gardner suggests that Matelda is "affectio divina inspiratione inflammata, ad normam iustitiæ seipsam componens." One of the appendices contains a passage from the life of Celestine V, by Thomas of Sulmona, in which it is related that Celestine, when fleeing in disguise, after the gran rifiuto, was miraculously recognized by all the strangers whom he met. This gives a new meaning to the "vidi e conobbi" of Dante's lines.

Mary G. Steegmann has made a readable book on the life of Bianca Cappello (Baltimore: Norman, Remington & Company). It follows in general plan the model which has been exploited in England for a dozen years past, where biographies of the famous, and infamous, personages of the Italian Renaissance have been served up for popular reading. The wealth of illustrations and, even more, the varied and startling crimes of the heroes and heroines have given these books vogue. Bianca Cappello unquestionably merits the attention of the historian, because, except Emma Hart, probably no other modern courtesan played a more conspicuous rôle. The beautiful Venetian adventuress succeeded in making herself the wife of Francesco de' Medici, Grand Duke of Tuscany. Miss Steegmann has evidently read the authorities, besides making herself familiar with the Florentine environment of the second half of the sixteenth century. She writes for fairly intelligent readers, not for specialists, and, except for the occasional use of theatrical expressions, she refrains from fine writing. Of the astonishing interest of Bianca's career, we need not speak.

Science

To their History of the Sciences series, Henry Holt & Co. add this week "The History of Psychology," in two volumes, by James Mark Baldwin.

An addition to the rapidly growing literature on economic geography has been made by Prof. J. Russell Smith with a large volume entitled "Industrial and Commercial Geography" (Holt). This book has been in preparation for a considerable time, and its appearance has been awaited with interest by many geographers and economists throughout this country. The author has followed the lead of earlier writers within the same field in undertaking to interpret the earth in its relation to man. Particular emphasis, however, is placed upon the economic activities of man himself rather than upon the natural features of the earth which constitute his physical environment. The author's point of view is well illustrated in his statement that the book "deals with human activities as affected by the earth, rather than with parts of the earth as they affect human activities." The work is divided into two distinct parts, as suggested by the compound title. Two-thirds of the volume is concerned with a rather detailed discussion, supplemented by numerous charts and diagrams, of the world's principal industries. Here are included not only those industries which arise from the cultivation of the soil, grazing, lumbering, mining, and fishing, but also the numerous lines of manufacture associated with chemicals, machinery, and shipping. No attempt has been made to arrange the material by regions or even by political divisions, as has been the custom of many earlier writers. On the contrary, each industry, although it portrays, at least to a limited extent, the trade activities of the separate countries, is treated as a unit irrespective of its predominance in any particular country. In a word, the subject has been approached from the monographic rather than from the geographic standpoint.

The second part of Professor Smith's book is given over to a discussion of the commerce of the world, and is largely descriptive. Here the author seems to have drawn rather freely at times upon his earlier works, entitled "The Organization of Ocean Commerce" and "The Ocean Carrier." The world's principal trade routes are described and the volume of commerce that traverses them is considered. Furthermore, an attempt is made to explain the causes, mainly geographic and economic, which have given rise to the great shipping centres of the continents. And, finally, the influence of geographic factors upon the commercial policies of nations is discussed. For the use of those readers who desire a fuller treatment of the various topics than the general plan of the book would admit, there has been included a list of references at the close of the chapters.

Dr. Charles McBurney, the well-known New York surgeon, died suddenly at the home of his sister in Brookline, Mass., on Friday; this was scarcely a week after his return from a hunting trip in Maine. In late years he had been in broken health and lived in retirement on his estate at Stockbridge, Mass. He was born in Roxbury, Mass., in 1845, received his A.B. from Harvard in 1866, in 1869 the A.M., and the following year the degree of M.D. from the College of Physicians and Surgeons. In this college, after being an assistant and lecturer, he became in 1889 professor of surgery; from 1892 to 1907 he was professor of clinical surgery, and then was made emeritus professor. It was particularly in hospital work that Dr. McBurney gained the experience which made him so eminent as an authority in accident cases. For thirteen years he was the chief consulting surgeon at Roosevelt Hospital, and through him the private pavilion in West Fifty-ninth Street, directly opposite the College of Physicians and Surgeons, known as the William J. Syms Operating Pavilion, was erected in 1892. Dr. McBurney, it will be recalled, was summoned to attend President McKinley at the time of his assassination. Among the medical societies of which the surgeon was a member or honorary member were those of Edinburgh, Paris, Rome, and Constantinople.

Sir William Henry Preece, former engineer-in-chief and electrician of the British Post Office, died in London on Thursday of last week. Born in Wales in 1834 and educated at King's College, London, he was an authority on the telegraph and telephone, having introduced the latter in England. In the early eighties he also began experiments with wireless, and it was through his support that Marconi was enabled to build up his system in England. Sir William Preece collaborated with various friends on telephonic and telegraphic manuals.

Alfred Russel Wallace, an appreciation of whose scientific achievements is given on another page, died in London on Friday, in his ninety-first year. He was born at Usk in Monmouthshire, and after studying at the Hertford Grammar School, he became a surveyor and architect. He was engaged in scientific expeditions to the Amazon and to the Malay archipelago; in 1886-1887 he lectured in America. His published works include: "Travels on the Amazon," "Palm Trees of the Amazon," "The Malay Archipelago," "Natural Selection," "Miracles and Modern Spiritualism," "The Geographical Distribution of Animals," "Tropical Nature," "Australasia," "Island Life," "Land Nationalization," "Bad Times," "Darwinism," "Vaccination a Delusion," "The Wonderful Century: Its Successes and Failures," "Studies, Scientific and Social," "Man's Place in the Universe," "My Life," "Is Mars Habitable?" "The World of Life," and "Social Environment and Moral Progress," the last-named having been published so late as last year.

Drama and Music

Plays by Bjørnstjerne Bjørnson. Translated from the Norwegian with an Introduction by Edwin Björkman. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.50 net.

The plays of Bjørnson deserve an English version as complete and authoritative as Mr. Archer's Ibsen. Mr. Björkman, neither in his choice of plays nor in the quality of his translations, has made an attempt to begin such a task. He has chosen "En Hanske" ("A Gauntlet"), which has been put into English at least three times before, most recently by Mr. Farquharson Sharp, for the volume published in Everyman's Library; "Over Evne," Part I ("Beyond Our Power"), which has been translated into English at least once before; and "Det ny System" ("The New System"), translated here, we believe, for the first time. The first play is a plea for equality in purity between the sexes, the second a study in the futility of religious and therapeutic hysteria, and the third a revelation of the heroism required for a successful fight against rotten commercial morality. It is particularly disappointing that the author should not have replaced "En Hanske" by a translation of the powerful second part of "Over Evne."

The volume is, in no sense, then, a promise of a complete English version of Bjørnson's plays. As a matter of fact, it is unworthy of Mr. Björkman.

It seems to have been written in haste; at any rate, it contains much English familiar only to the hack translator. Annoying ignorance of English idioms like the following greet the reader on almost every page: "Think only" (for "Just think of it"); the question, "Have you read it?" is answered, "If I have read it?"; "It put such courage into us, as if we might make the whole world over." "I am thinking of—thinking of—of what our dear daughter is made up."

With this sort of translation American readers are, alas! all too familiar. In the present case it not only produces the usual fatigue and irritation, but it also gives a false impression of Bjørnson. It makes him seem queer, remote, and orphic, when he is really unusually straightforward and colloquial. English readers will get a much better notion of "En Hanske" by reading the inaccurate but thoroughly idiomatic version of it appearing in Everyman's Library.

The three plays give a fair impression of one of the least original elements of Bjørnson's versatile genius—his ability to present a study of a social problem in a severely realistic play. In both "The New System" and "A Gauntlet" he clearly imitated work which Ibsen had done immediately before him. The first was written two years after "The Pillars of Society" and is dangerously like it in both subject and plot. "A Gauntlet," written after "Ghosts," in a manner infinitely less effective than that of Ibsen, demands sexual purity of the man. In both of these plays Bjørnson is flighty and indecisive, largely because he insists on preaching the cure for evils that he has not taken the time thoroughly to understand.

"Beyond our Power," a drama written without thought of the stage, is not so clearly a play of social comment. It is an imaginative account of the self-deception of a Pastor Sang, a clergyman in a remote part of Norway, who believes that he can work miracles through the power of prolonged trance-like prayer. As a reflection of life amid the bleak and stern rocks of the more Arctic parts of Norway, the play is impressive. As a criticism of the life which it portrays, it remains incoherent, largely because Bjørnson writes of Pastor Sang not with the poise of an observer, but with the enthusiasm of a devotee.

All of these plays are permeated with the author's great energy. Written as they were with a gusto which is unmistakable even in the translations, they give the reader a sense of immense moral earnestness confused by its very vehemence. Indeed, Bjørnson, preacher as he was and wished to be, talked more effectively through his personality than through his work. He was the man he wished his countrymen to be. His life and spirit transcended the small intellectual and social conditions against which he fought. His personality was the enthusiasm he wished to instil into the cynical and jaded pragmatists of his country. For all these reasons Bjørnson was, and always will be, of much greater importance to Norway than to the rest of the world. His peasant stories and some of his comedies we may continue to read with sheer delight. His social dramas we shall consult only as students of the life of the North.

Lady Gregory's "Our Irish Theatre" is promised by Holt this week.

The Oxford Shakespeare—the complete works—has been reissued by the Oxford University Press, with the addition of forty-nine full-page illustrations, many of them in colors. Reproductions have been made of paintings of Shakespearean scenes by W. Hamilton, F. Wheatley, Edwin Abbey, J. F. Rigaud, Henrietta Rae, R. Smirke, R. Westall, and others. The editors have also used W. W. Quatremain's water-colors of the Shakespeare Memorial Theatre at Stratford and of Ann Hathaway's cottage.

The "General John Regan" of George A. Birmingham (Canon Hannay), produced in the Hudson Theatre, proved to be one of the most entertaining Irish comedies witnessed here in a generation. Many of the pieces presented here by the Abbey Theatre players, while strong in a dramatic and imaginative sense, and essentially truthful in spite of their admixture of fact and idealism, were neither attractive nor convincing. Synge, Yeats, Lady Gregory, and their associates were dealing with types wilder and older than those employed by Mr. Birmingham—a point which has to be borne in mind—but the fact remains that to the ordinary comprehension they seem less real and less human. The story of "General John Regan" is as slight as it is improbable. An American tourist—to amuse himself—declares that he is preparing a biography of a famous soldier and patriot, ex-president of Bolivia, who was born in the town of Ballymoy, the scene of action. He wonders there is no statue of this purely imaginary hero in his native place. A local doctor, Lucius O'Grady, promptly declares that there is a statue, and that the Lord Lieutenant is soon coming to unveil it. He then provides the American with all sorts of details of the imaginary Regan's early life, and by sheer force of impudence compels his friends, an innkeeper, a priest, an ex-major, an editor, and others, to back him up in his assertions and help him to convert them into solid fact. And he carries all his plans into effect in the face of all sorts of difficulties and puts up his statue—a second-hand figure from an undertaker's stock—in face of the American's assertion that no such person as Regan ever existed. This yarn, of course, is farcical. It is simply a framework to hang the different characters on; but these are all vital and easily recognizable types. The doctor, the mainspring who moves all the other puppets, is, of course, in one sense an imaginary creature, but he is, nevertheless, genuinely Irish in his audacity, his humor, and his resourcefulness. In England it has been played, with immense success, by Charles Hawtrey, the most accomplished stage liar of his day. Here it was undertaken by Arnold Daly, an actor of second-rate powers, with less striking results. But he succeeded partly, by the sheer force of opportunity. Harry Harwood, as an innkeeper; W. G. Fay, as an editor; A. G. Andrews, as a landlord, and Maire O'Neill, as a servant girl, were all exceedingly good. The general representation was excellent, and the mingled wit and humor of the dialogue kept the audience in continuous merriment.

Rehearsals are in progress at the Little Theatre, in London, of G. K. Chesterton's fantastic comedy, "Magic." The cast is now complete, and includes O. P. Heggie, Franklin Dyall, Fred Lewis, William Farren, and Frank Randall. The piece contains only one female character, which has been allotted to Grace Croft.

The publishing house of G. Schirmer has opened a large branch in London, for the special promotion and sale of American music throughout England and the Continent.

Of Paderewski, Sir Frederic Cowen writes in his reminiseences, just published:

We would sometimes go and have a game of billiards together, or else occasionally he would come to my house, and leave behind him not only lasting memories of his wonderful piano-playing, but more expensive ones in the form of jarred strings and broken hammers. He was not accustomed to the touch and mechanism of a small Broadwood grand.

Next to his art, keeping late hours and playing billiards were his favorite occupations—and probably are so still. I recollect one evening, in a provincial hotel, when several of us adjourned to the billiard room, to find it on the point of being closed. This would not do for Paderewski, so we induced the manager, at the risk of losing his license, to allow us to play sub rosa. The shutters were shut, the door was locked, and we played on until close upon five o'clock in the morning.

The catalogue of the British Museum Library contains no fewer than thirty-three pages of books by or relating to Richard Wagner, while the list of his compositions, with the selections and diverse arrangements of them, runs to 182 pages. The latest addition to the list of books concerning Wagner, issued in London, is by Percy Lindley. It is entitled "Parsifal and Wagner's Other Operas," and sets forth in simple language the story of Wagner's last music-drama, together with notes on its composition, a bibliography, and a record of first representations in Europe and America. Original casts and dates of first performances of other of Wagner's operas are also included in the book.

Evidently Cosima and Siegfried had no reason to fear competition from the performances of "Parsifal" to be given in many European cities as soon as the copyright expires on the last day of this year. News comes from Bayreuth that the demand for tickets for next summer's festival has exceeded all records.

Bizet's "Carmen" a few weeks ago had its 500th performance in Brussels.

Concert agencies in Prussia are alarmed at the agitation to pass a law which regulates their business and allows an agent a commission of 5 per cent. as a maximum.

Art

Colonial Furniture in America. By Luke Vincent Lockwood. New and greatly enlarged edition, with 867 illustrations of representative pieces. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $25 net.

Any notion that this country is barren of artistic traditions should be dispelled by perusal of this book. Making allowance for the derived character of early American cabinet work, a dispassionate critic, comparing this publication with any of the standard expositions of European national styles, must feel that the colonists, during the better part of a century and a half, made furniture which in exquisiteness of design, refinement of motive, adaptation to use, and the other marks of a vital, progressive art stood up well with that of any contemporary nation. The arts of an era, whether noble or ignoble, spring out of the common life; and merely to glance through the illustrations of Mr. Lockwood's book, especially if one is already familiar with recent works on American silver, is to realize that Copley and Stuart were not accidental. One wonders why, indeed, there were not more Copleys.

Moralizing on this theme may be inspired by Mr. Lockwood's book, but nothing of the kind will be found within its covers. Like most works of its sort, it avoids generalizations. It is throughout explicit, particular, and descriptive. It necessarily contains much repetition. Over and over again occur variants of this phraseology: "The cornice is heavier than in the preceding figure and consists of a quarter-round, a fillet, a cyma recta, a fillet, a cove, a fillet, a cyma reversa, a fillet and a cove. The dimensions are 7 feet 3 inches in height, 6 feet 2½ inches in width." One longs at times for a little more grace of style to help carry one over the details. English writers on the arts and crafts often put into their work a vigor of expression and intensity of conviction that does not in the least hurt its precision and clarity Mr. Lockwood, like most American authors of books of this class, affects an almost legal dulness of manner. One notes here and there a carelessness that is surprising in a master of arts of Trinity College. The grammarian in one resents so inexcusable a slip as this, from page 43, Vol. I: "At the base of each of the outer ones is cut two geometrical designs, and in the centre one is carved three rosettes." One wonders, again, what proofreader failed to "query" this sentence from page 51 of the same volume: "All the oak chests were made in the most substantial manner; the oak forming the frame, and the sides of the drawers is about one and a quarter inches in thickness."

Against the subject matter of this edition, which contains 651 pages, as against 352 pages in the 1902 edition, little can be said, unless the author's judgment should be challenged as regards an occasional choice or omission. It might conceivably be urged that the new work would have gained in appearance of catholicity if the author, in the decade between editions, had gone a little further afield among easily accessible public and private collections. In this, as in the earlier work, but two pieces have been selected from the very important collections of the American Antiquarian Society, in whose new building at Worcester are several valuable objects of furniture acquired in the past few years. If nothing else were taken from this collection (besides the two-seated chair and a slate-topped table which are described), one would have expected at least that mention should be made of an extremely interesting turned chair brought to this country by or for Richard Mather.

Again, since it seemed wise to include under bedsteads a picture and description of the famous Countess of Devon bed, which is not in this country at all, it might be asked whether the claims were considered of Mrs. James A. Garland's Elizabethan bed, with the original hangings, which was shown at the Copley Society's retrospective exhibition of the decorative arts in Copley Hall, Boston, 1911. The legend that Queen Elizabeth slept in this bed may or may not be founded in fact; the piece of furniture, at all events, is very remarkable, and would interest many readers. Several illustrations have been drawn from the admirable collections of Dwight Blancy, Francis H. Bigelow, Hollis French, and Dwight M. Prouty. It is natural to ask why nothing was obtained from the superb collection of Mr. Charles H. Tyler.

These omissions are noted only to suggest to the reader and prospective purchaser the limitations of even the best book yet published on American Colonial furniture. The author's great indebtedness to the Bolles collection of the Metropolitan Museum and the Pendleton collection at the Rhode Island School of Design is evident.

Longmans, Green & Co. have in press "Policy and Paint, or Some Incidents in the Lives of Dudley Carleton and Peter Paul Rubens," by the author of "A Life of Sir Kenelm Digby."

We have received the very handsome privately printed catalogue, "The Ffoulke Collection of Tapestries." Charles Mather Ffoulke early won a competence as a merchant. Being invalided, he turned to travel and collecting. His studies of tapestry began in the Archæological Museum at Florence about 1887, and three years later came the opportunity to buy the entire Barberini collection of 135 pieces. At various times Mr. Ffoulke added some 50 pieces to this nucleus. His later years were passed in Washington, where his tapestry gallery was a place of resort. He devoted himself generously to all good public causes connected with art, and died in 1909 deeply regretted. The collections of tapestries constantly overflowed the Washington house, and many were sold, notably the Romanelli life of Christ from the Barberini looms, which now decorates the choir of the Cathedral of St. John the Divine. This catalogue registers all the pieces that passed through Mr. Ffoulke's hands, about 300, and thus is a record of twenty years of indefatigable collecting. The catalogue portion is compiled from his own notes, there is a personal and biographical preface by Glenn Brown, and a general introduction by the Belgian expert, Ernest Verlant. None of the Ffoulke tapestries antedates the sixteenth century, and most are of the seventeenth and from Flemish looms. The famous makes of Beauvais, Aubusson, and Gobelins are also well represented, with a sprinkling of Italian examples. Mr. Ffoulke evidently loved the fully developed pictorial styles, and was singularly neglectful of the lovely Gothic weaves and their naïve derivatives in sixteenth-century Germany. He was successful in getting considerable portions of famous series, such as the Months of Lucas and the Achilles suite designed by Rubens. About a hundred of the pieces are finely reproduced, a few in colors, so that the catalogue forms a valuable repertory of classic examples. It is printed in folio on fine paper, the composition and press work revealing that fastidious excellence which one expects in publications bearing Frederic Fairchild Sherman's imprint. The edition is limited to 250 copies, and sells at $50 net.

THE CAUSES OF GLOOM.

It is a familiar comment of the day that a cloud of gloom has enveloped all the great money markets of the world, and the prevailing inference is that all of them are in the same box, and that the box is an extremely uncomfortable one. But this conception of the position of affairs requires more close examination. There are certain underlying influences which affect all financial communities, but even that is largely because of the influence of some markets upon others. The particular distresses of Europe are not present in this country in any similar measure; but we feel them here, because we are cut off from the usual access to Europe's resources of capital. In America, there is absolutely nothing of such apprehension as there was in the early autumn of 1907, for instance, that our large financial interests are caught in a trap.

We are, in fact, already well past the time of year when the cord of credit had absolutely snapped on that occasion, and no one is talking of a "crisis."

The situation has quite as little resemblance to the autumn of 1906, when Wall Street gasped with dismay at the intimation that European lenders, to whom we were indebted for prodigious lines of credit, were shutting their doors to the New York borrowers. On both of those occasions, the machinery of American finance was seriously out of gear; everything was over-exploited; we had used up our own capital and had run to the limit of our command of Europe's capital resources. We were the danger-point of the whole uncomfortable situation, and nobody knew it better than ourselves.

Thanks to our retrenchment of the past few years, our prudent finance, our proper utilization of the bounties of nature, and our suppressing of extravagant speculation, we are not in an intrinsically weak position to-day, but in a position intrinsically very strong. London does not threaten to refuse us credit which (as in 1906) we might use in drawing on the Bank of England's gold; it sends us gold to which it admits we are entitled as a matter of commercial settlement, but urges us not to insist upon our rights. Paris has not been taking our new securities up to the hilt; it has been taking our gold in unprecedented quantities, on a basis which makes the French market our debtor on the economic balance sheet. This is scarcely a situation which can be described as a show of weakness on our part.

But it is equally true that we cannot wholly disentangle ourselves from the embarrassments of Europe, and the European situation is certainly difficult to read. How much of the gloom and apprehension which appear in all foreign comments on the foreign situation is a matter of mood and sentiment, and how much the result of something radically wrong with European finance, one hesitates to say. It is at least extraordinary —unprecedented is not too strong a word—that Lombard Street should be talking of a 6 per cent. bank rate when the Bank of England holds a gold reserve never but once exceeded at this time of year, with a ratio of reserve to liabilities abnormally high for November. Such things give a sense of unreality to the situation, whose embarrassments, nevertheless, are extremely real.

What we know of the tangible factors in that foreign situation is that capital was in exceptionally active use up to the middle of 1912; that Paris had been lending with rather rash profusion to all the rest of the world; that Berlin and Vienna had been speculating extravagantly in stocks and land; that the Balkan War came like a thunderbolt into that vulnerable position; that, ever since, the Continental public has been sitting on its money, equally distrusting banks, governments, and investment securities, and that, in the very face of this, the Continental Governments have embarked on a career of unexampled extravagance in tax requisitions and money market borrowings. These are the patent facts.

It used to be an accepted maxim that Europe had to go through an economic crisis once every ten years or so. One of them came with the Paris crash of 1882; another in the Baring trouble of 1890; a third in the "Boer War panic" of 1899. It was not much more than a decade from then to 1912 and 1913. Nowadays, crises of this sort (except in the United States) are much more apt to be marked by a prolonged and exacting strain, followed by slow recovery, than by the sharp and sudden credit collapse of earlier years. When that is so, the gloom is apt to be deepest just before the horizon brightens.

THE SORROW STONES
An Unfinished Story
By Maud E. Williams
Crown 8vo. $1.35 net (postage 10 cents).

The background of the story is illustrative of the common daily life of simple country people among the fells and dales of West Cumberland, and describes the river and mountain scenery of that part. The minor characters and incidents, and the slight sketch of Oxford which comes in as a contrast to the wild fell country of the North, serve to develop the main idea of the story.

An Important New Travel Book

Across Unknown South America

By A. HENRY SAVAGE-LANDOR

Author of "In the Forbidden Land," "An Explorer's Adventures in Tibet," Etc.

LOST to the world for eighteen months, Mr. Savage-Landor penetrated a vast unexplored region of Brazil, Peru, Bolivia, Chili and the Argentine, covering a total distance of 13,750 miles. He experienced some of the strangest adventures that ever fell to lot of explorer. A work that adds materially to our knowledge of South America.

The New York Times says:

"Mr. A. Henry Savage-Landor's account of his perilous journey through the wilds of South America, from ocean to ocean, in which he travelled altogether 13,750 miles, is the most thrilling tale of adventure he has yet told. It is a brave and thrilling story told simply, in a manly and unaffected way."

LETTERS AND MEMORIALS OF

Wendell Phillips Garrison

Editor of The Nation 1865–1906

In one volume, crown 8vo, 300 pages. with photogravure portrait.

During the forty-one years in which he edited the Nation, with a thoroughness, ability, and conscientious devotion unsurpassed in the records of American journalism, Mr. Garrison was an indefatigable correspondent never employing an amanuensis, but writing tens of thousands of letters with his own hand to his contributors, who embraced practically all the leading American scholars and critics of the period. From a dozen groups of these, which have been kindly loaned by the recipients, a sufficient number of selections has been made to illustrate the relations between Mr. Garrison and his great corps of contributors, the frankness and tact which he exercised towards them, and the wide range of his interests, tastes, and sympathies. The volume also contains a brief sketch of his life, a dozen of his best poems, and several of his characteristic editorials, reviews, and essays, besides a fine photogravure portrait.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF ART

By EDWARD HOWARD GRIGGS

WHAT is Art? What does Art do to the artist who creates; to the student who appreciates? These questions underlie this work, which deals with the meaning and function of sculpture, painting, music and poetry and their interrelation. The author's purpose and method may be comprehended from his remark that it is "not a restatement of criticism and philosophy, but the condensed result of twenty-five years' study of works of art, in each of the four fields, recording and interpreting what these masterpieces have done to my senses, emotions, imagination and intellect."

A comprehensive bibliography and a full index add to the value of the book.

Whitelaw Reid's

Writings in Polities and Education Assembled in Two Handsome Volumes Entitled

American and English Studies

Royal Cortissoz explains the significance of this collection in a preface. He says:

"These volumes assemble some of the more important contributions made by Whitelaw Reid to the discussion of matters of public interest. They are designed to illustrate both his purely intellectual habit and his point of view as a citizen. The publicist is, in a measure, a man of action, exercising an influence which, if not always immediately obvious, is nevertheless often decisive, and Mr. Reid's career brought him into very close and effective contact with the subjects here treated."

History of Japanese Mathematics

BY

DAVID EUGENE SMITH

AND

YOSHIO MIKAMI

This work sets forth, in a style that the non-mathematical will have no difficulty in following, the history of the native mathematics of Japan. It traces the development of the science from the earliest period, when the influence of China was only slightly in evidence, down to the nineteenth century, when the mathematics of Europe finally replaced the ancient wasan. In particular it tells the interesting story of the soroban and the sangi, the abacus and computing rods of Japan; it relates the history of the rise of higher mathematics in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries; it sets forth in a non-technical manner the work of scholars in the field of the yenri, the native calculus of the country, and it shows the nature of the problems that were studied, problems that display the same patience that is seen in the intricate ivory carvings of the Japanese artisan.

Professor Smith's interest in the history of mathematics, his first-hand acquaintance with Japan, and his large collection of books and manuscripts on the native wasan, fit him peculiarly to write upon the subject.

The work is profusely illustrated with facsimiles from important books and manuscripts in the collection of Professor Smith.

Winthrop's fascinating romance of travel remains our most vital picture of conditions in Washington and Oregon during the territorial period, sixty years ago. The value of his book, for all who are interested in Western history and adventure, has been doubled by the addition of his letters and diaries, which cover his entire stay on the Pacific Coast, beginning at San Francisco early in 1853, and closing with his overland trip East via Salt Lake City in October.

Animal Communities in Temperate America

A Study in Animal Ecology Designed to Serve as a Reference Work and Textbook. By VICTOR ERNEST SHELFORD, of the Department of Zoölogy in the University of Chicago.

This volume presents the principles of field ecology, illustrated by the more widely distributed animal habitats of the eastern half of temperate North America, and the aquatic habitats of a much larger territory. Six chapters deal with general principles. In several chapters the animal communities are considered from the point of view of modern dynamic ecology. A valuable feature of the book is the three hundred figures of widely distributed animals chosen to represent the chief types of animal communities and their characteristic modes of life.

"A Book of world-wide interest"

Col. Roosevelt's Own Story of His Life

THEODORE ROOSEVELT: AN AUTOBIOGRAPHY

This exceptional story of a life replete with human interest, told in Col. Roosevelt's characteristically vigorous and easily flowing colloquial style, is one that will make a strong and satisfying appeal to every class of readers.

To the lover of the strenuous life as well as to the student of contemporaneous history, to the young people of the country particularly, who all find a special attraction in personal narrative of active achievement, this autobiography will afford keen satisfaction and high inspiration.

From his boyhood days in Long Island, his adolescent youth at Harvard University, his young manhood days in the Wild West, and through a diversified public career which led to the Presidency of the United States, Col. Roosevelt was a learner as well as a born leader. In this book he tells of the many things which he learned and how he learned them, relating them primarily with a view to the help they may give others.

Taking the initiative in many of the most important events of our times—both national and international—his autobiography is a unique record of men and events, and of a career of almost unparalleled interest.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 20, 1913.

The Week

In Presidential messages it is quality, not quantity, that counts; and Mr. Wilson's announcement that he intends to adhere to his own precedent in regard to brevity as well as in regard to the delivery of his messages to Congress in person will be accepted with satisfaction by the public, without distinction of party. His speech at the opening of the regular session of Congress will doubtless be much longer than the address with which he opened the extra session; but the very fact of oral delivery precludes the idea of such long-drawn-out dissertations as have been recently the fashion in messages from the White House. Of the many ways in which the Presidency towers above everything else in this country, there is perhaps none more remarkable than its power of commanding public attention. This unique advantage can be frittered away by too frequent use of the opportunity, reducing a Presidential utterance to the level of an ordinary occurrence; and it can be greatly weakened by mere overdoing in point of quantity. Mr. Wilson, since his inauguration, has been sparing in the number of his appearances, not only in person but even in print; and his utterances have been brief as well as few. Evidently, all this is no accident, but the carrying out of a fixed policy.

One recognized test of fidelity to the principles of civil-service reform is the number of "special exceptions" to the rules made by Executive order. In this respect a comparison is made by Good Government between the record of President Taft and that of President Wilson. The latter had, up to October 1, made twenty-six special exceptions—that is, appointments in the classified service without examination. Of these one was simply the renewal of an order issued by Mr. Taft, one was to permit a Japanese to take service in the Geological Survey, ten were reinstatements of men who, it is alleged, had been removed for political reasons, three were for appointments to minor clerical positions. Of the entire twenty-six, Good Government asserts that only two were really necessary. As to President Taft, it goes on to say that "his Administration made an average of sixty-one special exceptions a year, and his record at the end of his term was unusually bad. In the last seven months of his term he issued fifty-two orders affecting seventy-two persons." Thus it will be seen that, by comparison, and especially in view of the great pressure for offices put upon him during his first months in office, President Wilson has in this matter done considerably better than his predecessor. But this does not mean that he ought not to do better still.

The threat which Secretary Houston now directs against one of our most time-honored democratic institutions—the Congressional distribution of free seed—would be more dismaying if it were less familiar. Three hundred thousand dollars are annually wasted upon this form of official courtesy, when they might be spent on perfecting new seed varieties, or in other work of a really beneficial sort to agriculture. Wasted! When, from the point of view of your rural Congressman, there is nothing that so warms the cockles of political remembrance as an unwearied zeal in supplying the constituency with sunflower and pumpkin seed! When there are instances on record of families, by concerted effort, obtaining enough peas or beans for a substantial addition to the household larder! Then, too, there is the value of maintaining a paternal tradition from those brave days when the Western pioneer actually required such governmental assistance. Those who feel alarmed will doubtless find consolation in the futility of similar undertakings by the Secretary's predecessors.

Mr. Pindell of Peoria having denied that he ever received Senator Lewis's letter in regard to the Russian Embassy, and Senator Lewis having attributed its paternity to a discharged employee, Mr. Bryan and Mr. Wilson are going ahead with their plan of giving Pindell of Peoria a pleasant vacation for a year or so at St. Petersburg. He admits that he cannot stay out the full term, as his business will not permit. Mr. Bryan has the gravity not only to attribute the criticism of this appointment to "malicious misrepresentation," but to assert that the President will not allow this "to interfere with his right to nominate to the Senate the best qualified men within his choice for conspicuous and responsible positions." Pindell of Peoria the best qualified man when the country might have called on such men as W. W. Rockhill and John W. Riddle, who have spent years in the diplomatic service—Rockhill his whole life—both having been at St. Petersburg and other capitals. What may we not expect next from Mr. Bryan? We sincerely wish that the Senate would not confirm this nomination—though that is, we suppose, too much to expect—because of its obvious unfitness.

It would be a public misfortune if Mr. Wilson's Secretaries should deliberately assume the Rooseveltian attitude of charging everybody who disagrees with them with malice or improper motives. This is the second or third time that Mr. Bryan has been guilty of this. The criticisms of his appearing in vaudeville with bell-ringers and yodlers he brushed aside as based on a tissue of misrepresentations and being due solely to a malicious purpose to injure him. Mr. McAdoo sees in the protest against segregation chiefly an injury to Mr. Wilson through misrepresentation of facts; and his foolish outcry against the conspiracy of the Wall Street bankers to depreciate the value of their own bond holdings will be recalled. Apparently, in the Pindell case the net result of criticism is to make the Administration more obstinately determined than ever to make a blunder.

A National Convention of the Republican party in 1914, held in order to confess that control of the National Convention of 1912 was determined by the delegates from rotten boroughs, would be something of a novelty. Yet it is recommended by the law committee of the Republican National Committee. Only by a Convention can the basis of representation in Conventions be set right. We shall hear much more of this next month when the full National Committee takes the matter up in earnest. For the present, the plan deserves notice as one sign more of the feeling among Republicans that they must rehabilitate and reunite their party if they are to have a dog's chance in 1916. There is no longer a vestige of the comfortable belief that Wilson would make such a mess of it that any old party—à fortiori, the Grand Old Party—could beat the Democrats in the next Presidential election. Nor is there much left of the ancient hope that a popular reaction against tariff reductions will surely restore the Republicans to power. They are now in that chastened mood which means penitence and reform. To succeed, they know that they must deserve to succeed; and they contemplate, even if with a sigh, a course of moral training as necessary. As a sign of it comes the suggestion that they will take Judge Hughes as their candidate next time. But this will doubtless only make him go into active training for a vigorous refusal to permit the use of his name.

Among the arguments for the city-manager plan of commission government, adduced last week at Toronto by a committee of the National Municipal League, one was striking for its omission. As previously emphasized by Secretary Clinton R. Woodruff, it is the contribution of the plan to the ending of partisanship in city administration. "The scrapping of the old municipal machinery, the advancement of the commission form, the evolution from it of the city manager," he pointed out, had for one of their common aims the increasing elimination of party tickets and party feeling. "Candidates come forth on the basis of their individual merit and strength, with no adventitious aid from party labels." But government by departmental commissioners alone, except in isolated instances in central and southwestern cities, still labors under bondage to party lines. The employment of a city manager, by focussing public interest on individual efficiency, by calling experts from city to city, with no more thought of politics than a business firm would take, by giving the chief executive a longer term, by reducing the salaries and duties of the commissionerships, thus making them attractive to the public-spirited citizen, rather than to the professional politician, is a notable step towards more freedom. A pledge of the new spirit is already to be seen in Ohio, where Dayton is now considering calling to her service the most efficient of the State's municipal officers—ex-Mayor Hunt of Cincinnati.

Everybody knows that competition is more expensive than combination. The people are learning the truth. They find that the cost of living is higher now than it was before the combinations were destroyed.

We find this bit of economic wisdom in an article that sings the praises of the great "Trusts" as the sheet-anchor of American prosperity. It is not worth examining with any seriousness, but it suggests a question. What has become of the great stock argument of the Trust advocates, the thing we used to hear more than any other in the early days of the great combinations? In those times, the advocates of monopoly were continually talking of the economies of concentrated production, and pointing with pride to alleged reductions of the price of this or that staple after the gigantic combinations had been formed. Some of these assertions were true, others not; but even in the case of the true assertions, examination was pretty sure to show that the low-price tendency was in full operation before the Trust was thought of, and that the best that had happened was that the formation of it had not put an end to the process. But we have been hearing almost nothing of the kind at all now for some years. That the combinations have been "destroyed" will be news to most people; but certainly "the cost of living is higher now than it was before the combinations" were created. That the combinations have been the cause of this, we do not assert; but when the figures pointed the other way, they certainly had no better title to the credit than they now have to the blame.

Whatever the weaknesses or merits of the sixty-seven grievances of the employees of the Southern Pacific Railroad, in the strike just ended, the region affected must find it a matter of chagrin that prompt steps could not somehow have prevented the final breach. The dispute reached an issue with very great rapidity, especially when its progress is compared with that of the threatened strike of Eastern trainmen this summer. Yet with the rice and sugar crops awaiting transportation, the Southwestern interests to be hurt were extensive; and however radical the original differences, the immediate cause of the strike concerned only the method of debating them. The members of the four railway brotherhoods demanded a conference between the railway heads and their representatives as a federated body. This refused, 98 per cent. of them voted for a walkout. Meanwhile, the railways had offered to submit the matter to the Federal Board of Arbitration and Conciliation. Their step was belated, but it is scarcely creditable to the employees that it was futile. In the swift developments that immediately preceded the strike a few newspapers and the San Antonio Chamber of Commerce filed protests; but such bodies as the New Orleans exchanges made no move. The efficacy of their subsequent action, with that of the whole press, the agricultural bodies, and President Wilson, in ending the strike, shows how easily the expense and vexation of the four days' tie-up might have been avoided altogether.

We are entitled to a bit of satisfaction over the reduction in the homicide record of our thirty largest cities from 8.4 per 100,000 of the population in 1911 to 8.1 in 1912. The figures are from Mr. F. L. Hoffman's report in the Spectator of this city. Chicago still keeps well ahead of New York, with a rate of 9.6 to 6.8 for Manhattan and the Bronx, and 4.4 for Brooklyn. Even this last figure is higher than the rate in Paris, which is 3.6, although the French capital leads Europe in this respect. For London the figures are 1.31, and for Copenhagen the five-year average is only .45! This would mean no more than one homicide a year in a city like Denver or St. Paul, and only 21 for Manhattan and the Bronx, instead of 456. The unfavorable side of the statistics for 1912 is the increase in homicides in the South. Despite the concern that is manifested over the prevalence of crime there, the ten-year average of 15.7 went up last year to 20.2. This is more than double the rate in the Western and Central States, and almost five times that of the East. Memphis stands at the top with no less than 64.3 per 100,000, and this showing is made darker by the fact that it is an increase over the figures of 1911 by 11.6. Charleston, the nearest city to Memphis in this disagreeable kind of distinction, lags behind with 40.4, closely followed by Atlanta with 39.9. To the Atlanta Journal, this is a "fearful rate."

If there is any real interest in the revived plan of the National Association of State Universities for a Federal University at Washington, it must centre upon the definition of its aim and scope. President James of the University of Illinois, for example, who favors it, has long pleaded for State support in building up a local institution that should "make it unnecessary for any son of Illinois to leave its borders to pursue any branch of learning," no matter how high or specialized. Many other Western University heads have spoken to the same effect. What, then, is left for the Washington institution to attempt? This apparent contradiction, however, will give way if a real place for it to fill in "advanced work" can be shown. The advantage of its nearness to the bureaus and departments of the Government would be as obvious as in Paris, Berlin, or Buenos Ayres. Yet the universities in those capitals, as of countries in which education is far more centralized, and state patronage of the arts far more confirmed, than in the United States, can offer but an imperfect parallel to the functions of a "National University" at Washington. Something less grandiose, something of more specialized effectiveness, is probably in the mind of the Association; but of this the public has not yet been informed.

The University of Nebraska, through a publishing house of this city, has just issued the first number of the Mid-West Quarterly, a magazine interesting in itself and even more interesting as a sign of the times. The articles are, naturally, not all of equal merit. One, on "The Literary Interregnum," is a bit amateurish, and another, however clever in expression, makes one ask what kind of philosophy is taught where Socrates and Bergson are coupled together as exponents of the same truths. No doubt, too, the rest of the articles might be called academic by those who have become accustomed even to the better of our commercial magazines, but they are addressed frankly, we may suppose, to the smaller public, and they are academic in the good sense of the word—thoughtful discussions of the deeper problems of the day as seen from the angle where literature and education and life meet and cross one another. This Quarterly will be taken by some as a confirmation of the common opinion that the brains of the country are draining from our Eastern to our Western institutions. But that is another, and very tangled, story. Meanwhile congratulations to the Mid-West, and wishes that it may flourish. The present issue is all the work of Lincoln, but the prospectus indicates that articles are welcome from any quarter—even from the East.

A heavy slump in Cubist and Futurist stock is reported from Paris. The hanging committee of the Autumn Salon has borne down heavily on the fragmentary isosceles ladies with their pink and blue passions. The Salon authorities have borrowed a leaf from the Futurist philosophy, and "with a disdainful and magnificent air of destruction" kicked pretty nearly the entire clutter out of doors. The Cubists may be partly at fault, but the chief blame must rest with the Futurists. Their very name brought trouble on the whole business. If they had called themselves anything but that, the path of revolutionary art might have stretched forward beyond the horizon. If they had called themselves, let us say, Post-Cubists, then there might have been room for other advanced schools, the Pluperfect Cubists, the Hexagonalists, the Parabolists, the Parallelopipedonists, the Zeroists. But in their vanity Signor Marinetti and his followers seized upon the name Futurist, and thereby preëmpted what remains of eternity. Since the future was thus previously engaged, there evidently was nothing for revolutionary art to do but revolt against the future by seeking a return to something of the sanity and common-sense of the past. The pace of modern life is exemplified in the speed with which the cubistico-futuristic cycle of civilization has rounded to its full. Six hundred years from Giotto to Marinetti, and three years from Marinetti's beginning to Marinetti's finish.

Just after having made his admirable and humane proposal for a year of international rest in naval construction, the First Lord of the Admiralty announces that next year the number of officers and men in the British navy will exceed 150,000, and that 1914 will see the largest naval appropriation bill the country has yet had to shoulder. In time of complete peace, Great Britain is thus to have more sailors afloat and ashore than she mustered during the height of the Napoleonic wars, when the coasts were directly threatened. Again it is the German bogey which is called forth. In a few weeks, doubtless, we shall have a counterblast from Germany as a result of this speech of Mr. Churchill—and so it goes. But it is not only the naval fleet which is to cost so dear. Mr. Churchill asserts superiority for the British hydro-aeroplane, as the War Office recently claimed it for the British aeroplane. He adds, however: "That is not enough. We must have superiority in everything, not in aeroplanes alone." Britannia must rule the air as well as the wave, and, as he admits that French genius and German perseverance have thus far outstripped England, he calls the nation to sacrifice in these words:

> You have to make up your minds to spend yearly more money and pay month after month the toll of precious lives. The keenest eye, the surest hand, and the undaunted heart must be offered, risked, and sacrificed in order to attain, as we shall undoubtedly attain, that command and perfection in aerial warfare which will be an indispensable element in naval strength and naval security.

All this is certainly an added reason why our Congress and President should now take the lead in working for the year of naval holiday which Mr. Churchill first suggested.

Yuan Shi-Kai's last manipulation of China's new Parliament is not so drastic as first reports intimated. It is not a question of abolishing the national assembly and erecting an appointive administrative council in its place, but of cutting down the membership of Parliament and substituting an appointive council for the present elective Senate. That this means preparation for the establishment of a Dictatorship does not necessarily follow. It is the logical outcome of the test by force of arms which the Radical party invited. When the insurrection in the South of China came to an end, a swing towards the concentration of power in the hands of Yuan Shi-Kai became inevitable. But, after all, there never was reason for supposing that China would be saved the painful and laborious apprenticeship in parliamentarism and democracy that every nation must pass through.

"SEDITION," AT HOME AND ABROAD.

Larkin, the Dublin strike leader, served only two weeks of his seven months' imprisonment. He was released by order of the Government at London; and his first words on obtaining his freedom were that the Government had made a greater mistake in letting him out of prison than in putting him in. In this opinion, Mr. Larkin is certainly wrong; but that the imprisonment itself was a mistake there is very little room to doubt. Before the Government had acted, sober opinion in England, as expressed both in radical and in conservative journals, had strongly condemned the action of the Dublin judge and jury. The London Spectator is what, in the glib nomenclature current in this country, would be called "reactionary"; and the Spectator says of the Attorney-General's plea for conviction on the charge of seditious utterances that it is the sort of thing "we expect to read in a trial for lèse-majesté in Prussian Poland, or in a conspiracy trial at Agram." The radical London Nation naturally takes a not less serious view of the matter. It speaks of the prosecution of Larkin as a "war on words such as any advanced thinker or free talker might use with relevance in the heat of argument or controversy"; and it declares that "no Liberal Administration can without deadly hurt" identify itself with such proceedings.

Recent experience in our own country has furnished more than one parallel to this Dublin affair. At Paterson and at Lawrence we have had instances of the same kind of forgetfulness of the abiding principles both of free speech and of fair play, and the same kind of short-sighted policy. On this side of the Atlantic as on the other, the explanation is obvious enough; in the stress of a situation charged with the danger of lawlessness on a large scale, and already marked by disorder and grave economic disturbance, there is great temptation either to stretch the law, or to apply it with all the rigor that extreme and virtually obsolete provisions admit. And, so far as concerns either real justice or the practical effect on men's minds, there is little to choose between downright stretching of the law and the application of provisions which, by common consent, are regarded as a dead letter. It is felt in all such cases that the court has condemned the man to punishment not as the doer of the specific act charged against him, but as a champion of the cause which he was engaged in promoting. A striking illustration of all this was furnished in the recent case of Haywood, whose sentence at Paterson has just been reversed on appeal, with a sharp rebuke to the court below.

But in relation to all this it is necessary to make a vital distinction—a distinction which philanthropic sympathizers with labor leaders are very much given to overlooking. The distinction happens to come out with special clearness in connection with the case of Larkin. In the indictment he was charged not only with using seditious language, but also with inciting to riot and inciting to robbery. But on both of these latter counts, though a considerable amount of evidence was adduced against him, it was insufficient to convince the jury, and he was acquitted as to them both. Between the language of discontent and direct incitement to violent or lawless acts there is a distinction the recognition of which makes all the difference between a land of free speech and a land of despotism. It is true that the line may sometimes be difficult to draw. It cannot be defined in a hard-and-fast way as a mere matter of the words employed. Language which, in ordinary circumstances, would be taken merely as an expression of opinion or the utterance of a vague hope or desire, may assume in time of trouble and disorder all the character of a direct incitement to violence. In such a situation as that at Dublin, if Larkin had been proved guilty of incitement to violence, no such severe strictures as those of the Spectator and the Nation would have been made on the verdict against him.

But even with these distinctions well in mind, the actual course which ought to be taken in reference to the utterances of agitators cannot be laid down with anything like entire definiteness. There is in all this a higher expediency, whose claims may be said to be coordinate with those of justice itself. It is the dictate of that higher expediency that the rigor of the law shall not, except under the pressure of the clearest necessity, be invoked for the purpose of what would have the appearance of an invasion of the right of free speech. There is danger, to be sure, in this policy; for in so scrupulously avoiding the appearance of violating liberty it is almost impossible to avoid the reality of sanctioning license. But it is a choice of evils; free speech, even when it passes the line of rightful liberty, performs the invaluable function of the safety-valve. The result necessarily is an apparent inconsistency, which in extreme cases is pointed to as a reproach and even an outrage. The great example of all this is that of the Chicago anarchists. They had been preaching violence for years, and had not been molested; but when their preaching took bodily shape in the murder of the Chicago police, the inciters to the deed were hanged. And both in not stopping the mouths of the anarchists while they were only talking and in hanging them when murder had come of it, the Chicago authorities were acting upon those principles of the highest expediency which defy exact formulation, which must always be more or less open to dispute, but the application of which constitutes one of the most crucial tests of a nation's genius for government.

MEDICAL PROGRESS.

Mr. Abraham Flexner's article, in the November Atlantic, on "The German Side of Medical Education," deals primarily with the underlying elements of the situation as a whole. And yet he points out so many definite features in which the position of medical education in Germany differs—in almost every instance to its advantage—from that in this country that the article is anything but a series of glittering generalities.

The causes of superiority in the German medical system are briefly summarized by Mr. Flexner as follows:

> First, the high minimum level of organization and equipment, below which the Government will permit no medical school to live; second, the prolonged and serious secondary-school training, which is absolutely, without exception, exacted of every student in the medical faculty; third, the freedom of the German university, which gives the professor the strength and leisure to work and encourages the capable student to do more than the minimum requirements of the curriculum for graduation; finally, the high respect in which the practicing profession holds the teaching profession, and the custom of calling teachers freely from university to university.

The one great factor in our own situation which operates to offset these points of superiority is the steady flow of magnificent gifts which American men of wealth have been directing to the support of medical education and the furtherance of medical progress. "The German medical scientist," says Mr. Flexner, "looks with envy and wonder upon the munificence of the great American benefactors of medical education." It is the defect of this method that it has not the effect of directly raising the general standard. But even the general standard is powerfully affected by the example of one or two great schools; and the method of private initiative has the advantage that in any one place, without waiting for the adoption of a "country-wide" policy, an institution may be built up to almost any desired degree of excellence.

Since Mr. Flexner's article was written, two events have occurred which give fresh point to this last consideration. From an anonymous donor there has come to Cornell the magnificent gift of $4,350,000, which is to go into the general fund of the medical department in New York city. No part of the money is to be used for new buildings, and with an addition of $200,000 a year spent chiefly in getting the best possible men, the Cornell Medical School may be expected to take an important place in raising the standard of medical education throughout the country.

The other event, though not so dazzling, is, if anything, even more significant. The General Education Board has given to Johns Hopkins Medical School a special endowment of about $1,500,000 for the inauguration of a new departure in medical teaching—new not only in this country but in the world. This fund is to be used for the purpose of so reorganizing the Departments of Medicine, Surgery, and Pediatrics that the professors and their staffs in these departments shall completely withdraw from paid practice in order to devote their entire time to the care of patients, teaching, and research. That this new departure is in the nature of an experiment must be admitted; but that it will succeed and yield signal results is rendered highly probable by the nature of the gift, which was made not on chance notion of some well-intentioned individual, but as the result of representations made to the General Education Board by the Medical Faculty of the Johns Hopkins University and the trustees of the University and the Hospital.

To realize the advance that was instituted by the Johns Hopkins Medical School when it opened its doors twenty years ago requires an effort of memory. To make a four years' course necessary for graduation when three years was the maximum at American medical schools and two years was the usual period, would in itself have been a pretty bold step; but the requirement of an A.B. degree—and a good A.B. degree at that—or its equivalent as an essential for entrance was a truly radical innovation. But this was only an index of the kind of training that the school itself was to give. To do this effectively, it had the advantage of the complete coöperation of a great hospital, and the even more inestimable advantage of the extraordinary quality of that group of men who formed the nucleus of its Faculty. About these men were soon gathered others, whose ability in their own fields and whose devotion to science were hardly, if at all, less marked. The effect of this example upon medical education throughout the country was almost instantaneous; and, apart from its example, the Johns Hopkins Medical School has been sending out a stream of notable men who fill many of the most important posts in American institutions of teaching and research. This splendid service has been recognized by the General Education Board not only in the making of the endowment, but in bestowing upon the fund the name of the man who, above all others, has been the mainstay of the work of the Johns Hopkins Medical School. Dr. Welch is so modest and self-effacing that he may not set much store by the name; but he will be at one with all the rest of us in hoping that the William H. Welch Endowment for Clinical Education and Research may prove a shining landmark in the history of American medicine.

HOW POLITICAL PRINCIPLES TRIUMPH.

South Africans will always retain a grateful memory of the statesmen who had the courage to carry into effect self-government for the Transvaal and Orange Free State, which paved the way to the establishment of the Union of South Africa. I deem it a grand privilege and honor to be associated with the movement in connection with the memorial to Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman.

This was a cablegram sent by Gen. Louis Botha, Prime Minister of South Africa, and read at the recent unveiling at Stirling of a statue of Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman. Talk about time bringing its revenges! In this tribute, with its collocation of names, there is a reminder of mighty political changes, and a complete reversal of the popular judgment on men and measures, brought about in a few years. In the dark days, at once of the Boer War and the Liberal party, Campbell-Bannerman was exposed to all kinds of opprobrium. He was a pro-Boer. He was a Little Englander. He was the impotent leader of a hopeless party. But in his own lifetime all this largely passed away, and now he is acclaimed, even by his former opponents, as a statesman of large and sagacious mind; while the man who a dozen years since was leading his people in a war against England, but to-day is Prime Minister of a self-governing Boer commonwealth under British sovereignty, offers his grateful recognition of what Campbell-Bannerman did for South Africa. History can show few transitions so rapid as this.

In his address at the dedication of the statue, Mr. Asquith briefly sketched the qualities in Sir Henry which enabled him to carve out his success. He was not at all a genius, as genius is ordinarily defined. He had no striking personal gifts, whether of oratory or individual charm or political adroitness. A simple-minded man, he had early formed his political convictions, and clung to them with extraordinary tenacity, through good report and through evil. So meagre was his stock in trade! People were inclined to hold him in light esteem during all the period from, say, 1899 to 1904, when he was doing the thankless work of leading the dispirited and demoralized Liberal party. A mere stop-gap, he was thought to be. If ever the time came to form a Liberal Cabinet, a man of more brilliant parts would be necessary. But at last the politicians and the newspapers waked to the fact that Campbell-Bannerman had established himself in the confidence and affection of the people. His dogged sticking to his job when others ran away, his steady adherence to principle, his indomitable spirit and unyielding devotion to the cause he had made his own, slowly built up for him a solid popular strength. The old ridicule died out. There was a story of the London Times sending an agent around the country to sound public opinion about Sir Henry, and his telegraphing to headquarters: "Not safe to make fun of Campbell-Bannerman; he is very strong with the people."

So he certainly proved to be when the tide turned in favor of the Liberals. No one seriously contested his right to be summoned by the King to form a Liberal Ministry. He saw fulfilled the task at which he had labored in hours of gloom. His sure reward came. But above any personal satisfaction he may have felt in this, must have been his rejoicing in seeing the principles for which he had so stanchly stood come to their triumph. They had had their period of discrediting and eclipse. The enemy raged, faint-hearted friends quailed or slipped away, but, as Mr. Asquith said, Sir Henry maintained "a calm, unwavering confidence that never failed." He simply could not renounce his political creed merely because it seemed to be for the time unpopular. Bred in Liberal tenets, he refused to believe that they could be washed away by a temporary wave of Jingoism. In season and out of season he asserted them, and lived to see them applied in England and in the conferring of self-government upon South Africa. This last achievement has already been acclaimed as the wisest as well as the most astonishing work of English statesmen in our day.

It must not be forgotten that Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman's bestowal of self-government on the Transvaal and the Orange Free State was violently opposed by the English Conservatives. They denounced it as a step fraught with danger, and made the direst predictions of what would follow. None of these forebodings has been justified. South Africa is contented under the new régime and is loyal to the British Crown. Yet the same men who prophesied the contrary are now auguring countless woes if Home Rule in local affairs is granted to Ireland. One would think that these prophets of evil might be stayed, for a time at least, by recalling their sad misreading of Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman's gift of self-government to South Africa.

THE INTERNATIONAL MARINE CONFERENCE.

The International Conference on Safety at Sea, which began its work in London on Wednesday of last week, is of unusual significance because of the Titanic and Volturno disasters. Much has been done by the several nations and by the force of public opinion to better the conditions revealed by the loss of the "unsinkable" White Star vessel. But the Volturno disaster has again brought out the need of standardizing the regulations of all the seagoing nations. Of these, twelve are represented in the London Conference, the British and American delegations being especially noteworthy; the former is headed by Lord Mersey, who presided over the Titanic inquiry; the latter includes Senator Burton, of Ohio, who will well represent the travelling public, and Andrew Furuseth, the militant head of the International Seamen's Union, to whom the passage by the Senate of the La Follette bill is largely due. He may be trusted, together with J. Havelock Wilson, general secretary of the British Seamen's Union, to voice the wishes of the men before the mast and their comrades in stokehold and engine-room.

Naturally, the question of boats and life-saving appliances takes a large place on the programme, and next to it comes that of bulkheads and watertight compartments. The picture of the burning Volturno will confront the conference when it deals with fire-extinguishing appliances. The regulation of boat, fire, and bulkhead drills follows naturally, as well as the question of the efficient manning of boats. The reasonable and proper use of wireless telegraphy and the laying down of new rules as to assistance to be given to ships in distress are other matters that have their place on the programme, and of course the problem of ice warnings and steamship routes is not to be overlooked. Besides these there will be many minor yet vitally important matters to be considered, as, for instance, the question of better methods of launching and releasing lifeboats so as to prevent their being dashed against the sides of the ship in high-running seas. This was the cause of the terrible loss of life, when the officers of the Volturno made their grave error of judgment. It is admittedly idle to hope for a device that will absolutely insure the safe launching of boats in such storms as the incoming Atlantic ships reported last week. Had the Titanic not been favored by the calmest night one could possibly encounter in mid-ocean, the loss of life would have been far greater. But the important point is that, despite the warnings given by the loss of the Rio Janeiro off the Golden Gate and the Republic near Nantucket, and other disasters, no effort was made to end the shortage of boats and rafts and to remedy defective lowering tackle. For above a century there was no change made in the historic block-and-tackle davits until the quadrant davit carried on the Titanic began to come into use.

It should seem, therefore, as if one outcome of this conference might well be the establishment of an international bureau for the testing of new safety devices and bringing to the attention of the various nations those which demonstrate their worth. There seems to be no field for human ingenuity in which the inventor has so many difficulties in obtaining recognition for his talent as this. Anybody who can suggest new schemes for increasing the comfort of passengers and enhancing the luxurious surroundings of the first-cabin travellers on the first-class boats gets a hearing easily enough. It is the old story: the owner has not been interested in increasing his capital investment by adding costly equipment which attracts no trade and which may never be used, and never can be used in a terrific storm. Not that all ship-owners are heartless; their side of the situation must be considered as well as that of the other parties in interest. We have already called attention to the enlightened views of Robert Dollar, the owner of numerous American and British cargo ships plying on the Pacific Coast and to the Far East. Such as he will watch the proceedings in London with considerable anxiety, lest the Conference fail to distinguish between the needs of cargo ships and those of passenger vessels, and saddle all kinds of boats with unnecessary expense.

Take, for instance, the question of the manning of lifeboats. Mrs. Florence Kelley, who was a passenger on the Kroonland, one of the eleven vessels that went to the rescue of the Volturno, points out in the current Survey that the Kroonland carried lifeboat accommodations for 113 more persons than she is allowed to carry, but only 26 seamen. She asserts that to eke out the crews of the two lifeboats that went to the Volturno it was necessary to draft two waiters and two stokers. All the other boats were useless for this rescue work for want of able seamen. Obviously, 26 seamen for a ship the size of the Kroonland seems a ridiculous number, but can any vessel of this tonnage afford to carry seamen enough to man 34 lifeboats? Allowing only six to a lifeboat, that would mean 204 seamen who would be falling over one another in performing their few deck duties. Obviously, to work out a problem like this with justice to all concerned will require the greatest care. Perhaps the use of kerosene-engined lifeboats may help here, though they would add to the fire danger. As for the wireless equipment, for which the American delegates are expected to take a firm stand for all ships, it is interesting to note that the London Firemen's and Sailors' Union has passed a resolution binding its members not to sign on any ocean-going steamer after May first, 1914, unless it carries wireless. But if two operators for the wireless on tramps are insisted on, they will have nothing whatever to do except in the rare emergency of an accident to their own vessel, or some near-by ship.

It is thus the old question between profits and humanity which chiefly confronts the London Conference. On many points there will doubtless be immediate agreement, but a long session may be looked for, and will be needed, if due regard is to be given to all the interests involved.

THE TWILIGHT OF THE WHITE GODS.

Last week there came into the New York auction room a number of marble statues by American sculptors who were famous fifty years ago. Hiram Powers's Greek Slave was the most noteworthy. With her one touched an almost prehistoric phase of American æsthetics. In her day she was a veritable declaration of the artist's rights and independence of clothes. About her serene form was fought and won the battle for the sculptor's liberty in our free republic. Some sense that the Greek Slave is still a celebrity, if an obsolescent one, carried the bidding somewhat above a thousand dollars—perhaps a half of what it would cost to copy her reputably in fair Carrara. If the Greek Slave, speaking reverently, was on the bargain counter, her famous white contemporaries were nowhere at all. We decline to set down the pitiful prices that were paid for characteristic works of Thomas Crawford, W. W. Story, and Harriet Hosmer. It is enough to say that in no case would the auction price have bought the rough block of marble.

When one recalls that these were the great names of fifty years ago, that Powers's work may be said to have established American sculpture in the eyes of Europe, that Harriet Hosmer had the friendship and admiration of the Brownings, and Layard, and Leighton, that Story enjoyed a fairly consecrated celebrity through Hawthorne's eulogy of his Cleopatra in "The Marble Faun"—when one considers this fallen greatness, one is driven to sincere if trite reflection that all passes and naught is perdurable. Fifty years ago no reputations could have seemed more safely beyond vicissitude. And now one hardly knows whether to blame a public so forgetful of the taste of its fathers, or to praise the courage of those who ventured to pay anything at all for an art so completely passed from fashion. Perhaps our grandchildren will similarly make a merit of bidding in a bronze by Saint-Gaudens or Rodin at something less than the value of the metal.

Of course, there are reasons for the obscuration of these white gods. The time has passed when the most enthusiastic amateur will undertake the wholesale domestication of life-sized marbles. All this belonged to an ardent age before any pale cast of decorative fitness had dimmed the desire for the single fine piece. When the lambrequin fell the marble statue began to totter. Its unavailableness is now become fairly tragic. Only forty years ago it is entirely conceivable that at the prices of this sale some thrifty young couple would have cheerfully begun housekeeping with Zenobia. She is, after all, only eight feet tall—ceilings were then high—and would have seemed such an investment!

Upon the case of the twice humbled Palmyran queen we must linger. It is a capital instance under the rubric aptly named by Mr. Huneker "The Pathos of Distance." It was Harriet Hosmer's first venture in the grand style. Anxious Mrs. Jameson, the erudite and charming Layard, the friendly Brownings, eagerly watched the working out of the theme. Zenobia had a place of honor in the British Universal Exposition of 1862. After European acclaim, Zenobia came to Boston in 1864. Eulogies in prose and verse were heaped at her feet. Fifteen thousand people visited her in a few days. When she passed to New York, Bancroft, Bryan, Eastman Johnson, Kensett, Gifford, Drs. Beecher, Bellows, and Huntington, turned out to do her honor at the private view. The poet Whittier wrote of the statue:

> It very fully expresses my conception of what historical sculpture should be. It tells its whole proud and melancholy story. . . . In looking at it, I felt that the artist had been as truly serving her country, while working out her magnificent design abroad, as our soldiers in the field and our public officers in their departments.

Whittier and his fellow-admirers were in the main right. Zenobia is one of the best American statues of neo-classic type; for that matter, one of the best marbles that anywhere grew out of the tradition of Canova, Gibson, and Thorwaldsen. Zenobia is free from the frigidity of her type; she has only a minimum of the tricks that rightly go out of fashion. Admitting the unsuitability of marble statuary in the modern habitation, good taste and historic sense combined should have made a score of American museums compete vigorously for Zenobia and for her notable predecessor, the Greek Slave. That they did not is an indication of a peculiar defect in our civilization, the inability to detect any sort of artistic excellence when it is not presented in the passing forms of the day. At least, lovers of the last æsthetic mode, we are not Bourbons learning and forgetting nothing. Artistically, we learn very little and apparently forget everything.

HARD AND EASY GOLF COURSES.

Some of the golfing comments of Vardon and Ray, as they sailed for England, may strike American readers as a bit ungracious. It is true that the two professionals had pleasant things to say of their stay here. They had only thanks for the hospitality shown them, and spoke in praise of our golfers, particularly of Evans and Ouimet. But when their expert opinion on certain points was squarely asked by the interviewers, both Vardon and Ray took for their motto, vera pro gratis. They did not think that American amateurs could hold their own with the English. They believed that the United States, in spite of its wonderful advance in golfing matters, is still a country backward in this sport as compared with England and Scotland. And they were of one mind in declaring that the great majority of American golf courses are far too easy. By this they meant, of course, that the hazards and the nature of the greens here do not sufficiently call for the highest golfing skill.

A fine American retort to this might be made, but it would only betray ignorance. Vardon and Ray might be asked why, if our links are so kindergarten, they did not make lower scores on them. If it is so dead easy to negotiate our courses, why did they let Evans beat them both at Chicago, and Ouimet lead them by five and seven strokes at Brookline? Moreover, Vardon and Ray made, on the average, as low scores over our confessedly more difficult links as they did when playing those they describe as childishly easy. How could that be? One can imagine the sneer with which newspaper paragraphers will put the question.

The point is worth examining. There has been, during the past year or two, a great stiffening up of American golf courses. This is, of itself, a tacit admission that they have been too easy, judged by the scientific rigors of the game. Yet a great many people have been but dimly aware of the real difference between an easy links—a real "gentleman's course"—and one trapped on correct principles. Such players have known that they could not do as well at, say, the National Links, or Piping Rock, as over their own familiar and facile grounds, but they often express wonder why the crack golfers who can make a low score even over Myopia are not able to do very much better over a notoriously easy links. They may cut their cards by two or three strokes, but that is all; and it is thought to be mysterious.

The fact is, obviously, that this is to lose sight of the true basis of comparison between hard and easy golf courses. A certain number of strokes are normally required to get over the easiest links ever known. That is, if there are 18 holes, and not more than three of them single-shot holes, it will be impossible for even the most skilful players to do, as a rule, much better than "even fours." This simply means that merely to cover the actual distance, and without regard to unusually lucky approaches or long putts, the ball has to be hit an average of four strokes to each hole. Top-notch players often go lower than that, and do so the more readily on links presenting few difficulties; but even on these they cannot, in the nature of the case, go so much below their score on a hard course as the inconsiderate poor player thinks they should. What he is thinking of is his score, and the great difference between his best on an easy links and on a course where the handiwork of nature has been reinforced by the malignity of man. If the latter means ten or twelve strokes more for him, why should not the easy links mean ten or twelve less for the professional?

We have already explained why not. It is the duffer who furnishes the real test of comparison between easy and hard golf courses. Diabolically placed traps and tricky curves in the greens scarcely exist for the professional; he plays as if they were not there. That is the reason why he cannot make a much lower score on links where the hazards actually are not there. But for the poor player they mean dismay and destruction. He comfortably announces that he usually "goes round in the eighties." But this is on a course far from up to date, and probably in July or August, when the ground is baked so that a topped ball will run almost as far as one truly hit, and when any kind of sloppy shot will reach the green without getting into trouble. Transfer this complacent gentleman to a links like Garden City, formidable with a narrow fair-way and trapped so as to punish every bungled shot, and his mortification, or rage, will tell the real story of the difference between the hard and easy course. Many a soi-disant "eighty man" has essayed the National Links repeatedly, without being able to get under a hundred.

This greater severity of the English links is correctly assigned by Vardon and Ray as one of the reasons why the English standard of amateur play is higher than ours. There are other reasons, which will leap to the mind of every informed person. It is not merely a question of championships. With the exception of Walter Travis, our venturous amateurs have not fared well in England—though Schmidt gave the British a bad quarter-of-an-hour last year. The chances are obviously against any man who has to fight his way through a tournament against a high-class field. Hilton did it in 1911, but was early put out in the American championship last year. It is to be said, however, that the differences favoring the English are rapidly disappearing; and with the tendency now prevailing in this country to make golf links a sharper test of the fine points of the game, it may well be that Vardon and Ray, on their next visit, will find the conditions more nearly equalized.

NEWS FOR BIBLIOPHILES.

Although not a "Thackeray expert," I have a suggestion to offer on the point raised by Mr. William E. A. Axon in the "News for Bibliophiles," November 6, 1913. The question is that of priority between "the bold British boy," Little Billee, and the "pious French Middy," the hero of "Notre Dame de la Garde."

A daughter of the late Prof. Ferdinand Bôcher calls my attention to the words "To the air of 'Il y avait un petit navire'" under the title of "Little Billee" in my volume of Thackeray's ballads, and quotes a fragment of a song of which that is the first line, and which her father used to sing.

Il était un petit navire
Qui n'avait jamais navigué.

Quant ils . . .
Les vivres vinrent à manquer.

Ils tirent-s-à la courte paille
Pour voir qui, qui serait mangé.

Le plus jeune de l'équipage
C'est lui qui, qui sera mangé.
. . . . . .

Il monta sur la grande hune
. . . . . .
. . . . . .

Oh, Sainte Vierge, oh ma patronne,
C'est moi qui, qui sera mangé.

Whether the note referring to the song is Thackeray's or not, it shows that some one before Mr. Axon connected Thackeray's ballad with a French one, of which the fragment quoted is pretty certainly a version. The version, too, as even this fragment is enough to show, is nearer to Thackeray than the one quoted by Mr. Axon, because the "pious middy" is the more the hero for being the victim. As for the relationship between "Little Billee" and the "Petit Navire," it seems to me most probable that in an informal way it is about the same as the cousinship between the originals and Thackeray's "imitations" of Béranger, Horace, and sundry German songs. It may be that having picked up the French song he fitted the air in his mind with burlesque lines and stanzas in English, which remained unwritten, and perhaps uncompleted, until the "festive gathering at Bertini's" of which Mr. Axon speaks. If he had had the "Petit Navire" in mind, "Little Billee" is exactly what he would have written; the naïve attempts at sentiment are just the marks which his shafts always sought. The conspicuous piety of the hero is carried only two commandments beyond the normal to become caricature; being "le plus jeune de l'équipage," what more natural than that he should be particularly appetizing? The note—"To the air of, etc."—may not be authoritative, but if it is Thackeray's it might be taken as an informal acknowledgment of an informal indebtedness.

I hope that the fragment of the "Petit Navire" quoted here may be enough to identify it to some one who can supply the whole.

GETTING THE BEST OUT OF THE BEST.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: To the general principle of "getting the best out of the best" no one can take exception, but, in the opinion of the present writer, Mr. Charles S. Knox, in his letter of recent date to the Nation (October 30), has failed to consider sufficiently the differences between athletics and culture or learning.

It may be doubted if the "best results" in athletics has the same meaning as the "best results" in culture, using this latter word in the general sense of intellectual accomplishment. In athletic activities what is desired and sought is superiority to rivals for a season in athletic sports; in lower terms, and often, it is to win a victory in a particular sport, over a particular team, in a particular game. The rewards to the individual athlete are the class numeral or the "university initial on [his] breast," his photograph on the sporting page of the daily paper, the admiration and applause of female youth, and the approval, not unmixed with envy, of his fellow "students." In a word, the spirit of athletics or sport is rivalry, its characteristic is the defeat of an opponent, and its rewards, though resounding, are evanescent, not to say trivial.

In intellectual activities the idea of competition should be discouraged, mutual help of individuals should be fostered, and the acquisition of knowledge for its own sake should be the ideal. The chief reward should be the pleasure and satisfaction of accomplishment; not that we need dwell wholly on this high plane, for other more tangible rewards such as prizes, fellowships, and honors should be offered. But in scholarship there is no place for the ephemeral rewards of praise from "the student body, or the student press, or the press of the community." Not notoriety and applause for a day, for the victory of a day, but fame and commendation for years, for a lifetime of labor, should be the scholar's ideal.

It may be doubted if in many cases the "cum laude or summa cum laude . . . or some such honor is awarded for the work of a single term," or in "a narrow, specialized course," in which "the student had merely to commit to memory" a syllabus which the examining professor had made. Those honors are usually reserved for the completion of a college course, and are in fact an expression of praise from "the thoughtful public at large" through its spokesman for "distinction in . . . intellectual training and prowess." The praise is quiet, indeed, but it may be doubted if the thoughtful public is ever blatant.

Moreover, the praise thus given is adequate to the accomplishment. Four years of even assiduous study in college mean, after all, but a small accomplishment from the point of view of the public, large and vital as that accomplishment may be to the individual student. The fault is not in the under-praise of intellectual labor, but in the over-praise of athletic and other spectacular activities. Following out the cycle of the past, ours may be called the Age of Noise, in which characteristic it may be hoped the intellectual life will not share, but will maintain its tradition of quiet modesty.

As to the contention of the writer of the letter to the Nation, that "proposals to grade men in classes by merit rather than by age or alphabetized names, and to carry forward the superior men faster and further than their fellows, are quickly rejected as hostile to democracy and to the 'American spirit,'" we may express more than a doubt, especially as the plan advocated is, in some States, in use in the most democratic and American of institutions—the public schools. The feasibility of merit grading has certainly come up for discussion in one at least of our more advanced educational institutions, and no question of the un-Americanism of the plan has ever there been raised.

The chief objection to grading by merit in the college is a practical one. It is almost impossible for the college, with the income and teaching staff at its disposal, so to arrange its curriculum, its schedule of classes, as to provide for the merit classifications which, to be really effective, must be subject to frequent revisions. Moreover, there is, and should be, greater diversity in the methods and individuality of teachers in the college than in teachers of the more elementary school, and it is a question whether what would be gained by merit grading might not be offset by what would be lost in the student's efforts to adapt himself to the new methods of the new individual teacher.

Furthermore, it may be questioned if the segregation and more rapid advancement of "the best" men is, after all, desirable from the point of view of those men themselves. To the present writer it seems that herein is involved a false view of education, namely, that education consists solely in what a student learns from his teachers while pursuing a more or less definite college course. To the present writer, and he believes to many others also, this is not what "education" connotes. Many of us believe that, no matter how narrow a man's specialty may be, he is helped therein by the sum-total of his knowledge on all subjects; that the ideal specialist is the man who knows everything. We may close our ears to the derisive laughter this statement probably occasions, while remarking that the ideal can be striven for if not attained; and we may point out that non-segregation of the best may perhaps lead us some steps nearer to this ideal.

The best men—the number is not enormous—in a class which they outstrip will have time to spare, will have leisure. Being "the best," they will not waste this time in frivolities, but will use it in reading and study for recreation and profit. They may do this under the direct guidance of their teachers if they wish, for any teacher would be glad to direct such a man, or at their own sweet and unguided will, which may in some instances be best. Not infrequently, as the present writer knows, a chance remark of a teacher will suggest to such a "best man" a most interesting and profitable course of reading. Is not the knowledge thus voluntarily acquired of far more value to the student than would be to finish his prescribed course six months or a year before his less gifted associates? Or than would be to acquire a twelvemonth more of the specialized knowledge of his particular course or profession? Such extraneous knowledge may not lead to success, but at least it will lead to sedate pleasure and quiet content; will be a solace in the years when success no longer counts.

On the other hand, would not merit classification incite many men, purse-poor and not of exceptional ability, to overexertion in order that they might save time and money by "keeping up with the best"? And doubly to men of rare capacity who know the sting of poverty should be given every opportunity for the broader outlook. It is no kindness to hurry them through college and into the world.

Doubt may be permitted, too, as to whether the English system, which the writer of the letter to the Nation praises so highly, is, after all, much superior to our own. Its faults are different, but not, therefore, less serious. Certainly the English system has been severely criticised by Englishmen, and in recent years it has seemed to be undergoing a deep searching of heart.

As your correspondent says, "We cannot safely ignore the inequalities in man." Therefore, let "the best" take more—but not of the same medicine, nor in larger doses. And instead of saying, "Let us have 'pass' and 'class' in our colleges," let us say to our young men: Let us have more quiet and persistent search after knowledge and truth and less noisy seeking after success and rewards.

GETTYSBURG, PRESIDENT WILSON, AND THE UNITED STATES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: One of our English cousins, Sir Francis H. Champneys, Bart., who occupies the exalted position of president of the Royal Society of Medicine and of its twenty sections, has some remarkable ideas about the United States. In his opening address, printed in the official bulletin for October, he says:

We read this morning in the paper that it is the jubilee celebration of the amalgamation between the Northern and Southern States of America, at Gettysburg, on July 4. Fifty years have elapsed since, in 1863, the victory of Gettysburg took place. It was a crucial period of the war, and after that the United States was formed. It is interesting to remember that, and to remember that it has taken fifty years not only to amalgamate, but to consolidate, the United States, which is another thing. And the proof of that is that the present President of the United States of America is the first Southern person who has ever occupied that position. And I read in the Times to-day that he at first refused to be present at Gettysburg, fifty years after the defeat of his side; but that he afterwards reconsidered his action and determined to be present. . . . I see in the papers that this meeting of the veterans on the field of Gettysburg is not altogether free from risk for them, and I see that a provident Government has stacked a thousand coffins in full view of the veterans in the park, for anybody to take advantage of who feels inclined to do so. We have got no coffins, gentlemen, and, I think, no skeletons, either; but if we are to consolidate the Society as we ought to do, we have to remember that the time has come to "think imperially." . . .

At the time of the formation of the United States of America each State reserved its own peculiar rights; and with so much tenacity have they preserved them that a man may be married in one State and not married in another. . . .

It is quite conceivable that, at some time or another, one State may plunge the whole of the United States into war.

And so the United States is but fifty years young! It is a beautiful compliment to Miss Columbia, who we thought was beginning to feel her age a little and resemble the classic features of Miss Democracy. But what of Washington and Jefferson and Madison and Monroe? Sic transit gloria mundi. G. H.

WILLIAM PITT PREBLE LONGFELLOW.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The recent death of Mr. Longfellow has removed from us a man whose services to the cause of architectural studies, extending over a long period of time, have been equalled in value by those of few other men in America. It would, indeed, be hard to name another whose range of interests germane to architecture has been so wide, and whose theoretical and technical equipment was so varied and so thorough. A man of liberal scholarship and finest literary culture, Mr. Longfellow was also a mathematician and an engineer, as well as an artist; and, what is not, I believe, so well known, he was an accomplished musician and a musical composer of uncommon gifts and attainments. He never sought notoriety. In the rude struggle of competition his fine nature could take no part. And although in early life he had the practice of architecture as a vocation keenly at heart, his mind was, at the same time, largely occupied with the history and philosophy of the art. It was thus not unnatural, with his temperament, that after a brief period he should withdraw from actual practice and devote himself to study and writing. He was, I believe, gradually led to this course by the establishment of the American Architect—a periodical of which he became the first editor. The leading articles by him, with which the pages of that journal were enriched during the time of his editorship, would, if gathered together, form a volume of great value to students who look upon architecture as a liberal art.

After resigning his post as editor, Mr. Longfellow devoted a vast amount of time to editing the "Cyclopedia of Architecture" (New York, 1895), to which he contributed a large part of the subject matter. In this laborious work he succeeded in gaining the collaboration of some of the most competent American writers. He also contributed largely to Sturgis's "Dictionary of Architecture and Building," and to the pages of many periodicals.

Among his last works were "The Column and the Arch" (New York, 1899), and "Applied Perspective" (Boston, 1901). Both of these volumes are written in his most careful and lucid style. In "The Column and the Arch" he endeavors "to trace in sequence the main thread that binds the successive phases of European architecture, and the evolution of the two leading features of its forms, the classic order and the arch." This book is marked by historic scholarship no less than by architectural acumen. In the "Applied Perspective" he not only shows complete mastery of the involved geometry of the subject, and perfect lucidity in discussion and demonstration, but also, what is rare in such treatises, a fine sense of the artistic value of perspective. Mr. Longfellow wished, as he once said in conversation, to help his reader "to see perspectively," and to realize how things are beautified by perspective.

As a lecturer his subject matter was carefully thought out, and was always well arranged. In debate he was cautious in statement and deliberate in utterance, but always weighty. In conversation he was reserved, but ready with serious and thoughtful remark when occasion required, and at other times he was delightfully entertaining, and, with his fine sense of humor, often amusing.

His numberless activities in connection with the American Institute of Architects, the Boston Society of Architects, the World's Columbian Exposition, and the Boston Museum of Fine Arts were untiring and fruitful.

He was a sailor, too, and was fond of sailing. For some years he spent a part of every season cruising in his yacht. Into this recreation he put the same intelligent study that was characteristic of him in whatever he did. Few men have been better acquainted than he with the design and construction of a sailing boat. He was also a skilful photographer, and kept abreast of all developments in this process. His works, his refined nature, and his unobtrusive life have enriched the community in which he lived.

CREDIT GIVEN.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: My attention has been called to the fact that in a recent book of mine, entitled "European Cities at Work," the translation of an advertisement from a German newspaper as well as certain material bearing upon the government of German cities was not credited to "The Government of European Cities," by Prof. W. B. Munro, of Harvard University, from which they were taken.

The book was prepared in large part as magazine articles and as lectures, with no idea at the time of publication in book form. This explains the omission of acknowledgment, which I desire to correct.

THE OPIUM VICE IN JAVA.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I can now give you a few more facts upon this subject. The Dutch Government of Java, having manufactured its opium at the "Government opium manufactory" in Batavia, proceeds to distribute it throughout the country. For this purpose the opium is enclosed in small leaden tubes, stamped with the Government seal, and sent to the Government agencies in the various towns and villages for retail sale. The tubes are of different sizes and are sold at prices (given here in American money) varying from 5 cents to $3.50, according to the quantity of opium which they contain. I visited the "opium verkoop plaats" (as these retail agencies are called) in Garoet, a small town among the mountains in the Preanger regency, and saw the opium sold to various purchasers at a little wicket window opening upon the street. I followed one of the purchasers to an opium den, where I found all the wooden bunks full of Chinamen smoking opium. It is only fair to state here that, if I am correctly informed, which I believe to be the case, the opium is sold exclusively to Chinamen at the "opium verkoop plaats"; but there are 300,000 Chinese in Java, and they control almost the whole of the native retail trade. It is therefore probably a simple matter for the natives to buy opium from the Chinese, if they wish to do so.

It is a difficult and delicate matter to procure information on this subject; but I have been able to ascertain that, when the population of Java was only 16,000,000 (it is now nearly double that number), the yearly profits of the Government from the sale of opium were 12,000,000 gulden ($5,000,000), and it does not seem possible that so large a profit can be derived from the opium consumed by the Chinese alone; but even if the Chinese be the only victims, why should the Dutch Government grow rich by corrupting the Chinese? We have here the singular spectacle of a Christian Government making a profit by fostering a destructive vice in its own territory. Unfortunately, this spectacle is not unique.

Many private persons formerly made fortunes by importing opium into Java, but the Dutch Government has now acquired for itself the whole of the profits from this vice by entirely prohibiting the importation of opium. From one point of view, this Government monopoly in opium is fortunate, because the closing of the Government opium manufactory in Batavia would now instantaneously end the opium vice in Java. THE ANAGRAM.

(It will be recalled that Joseph Severn was the devoted companion of Keats in his last illness at Rome.)

Within the circle of the lamp's bright glow
Were placed the letters of the poet's name,
From which to find new meaning was my aim,
By patient shifting of them to and fro.
But sole result of all my efforts slow,
Like some faint spark where I had hoped for flame—
As if John Keats could only magic frame!—
Was just a phrase of two short words: "Thanks, Joe."
Such little words! And his the voice to sing
Sweet as his own gold-throated nightingale,
Flooding with liquid ecstasy the air,
Yet churl in this. Then quick remembering
The love that 'twixt those friends did once prevail,
I saw a grateful heart enshrinèd there.

THE SISTER'S SON.

Uncle and Nephew in the Old French Chansons de Geste: A Study in the Survival of Matriarchy. By William Oliver Farnsworth, Ph.D. New York: Columbia University Press. $1.50 net.

The bearing of the literary relationship of "the sister's son" upon the larger question of the existence of mother-right among the Indo-Germanic peoples is growing clearer as fresh evidence is adduced. The only reasonable explanation of nephew-right is the existence of a matriarchal state of society in which inheritance passed through the female line. The traces of this state of society in the early laws and practices of certain peoples make reasonable the theory that the primitive laws of inheritance among the peoples of Western, Northwestern, and Northern Europe gave way before the Roman law granting to the father the domination of the family. Recent historians of mother-right have gone far afield for evidence of its existence in the practices of remote peoples and of exclusive tribes. The aborigines of Australia, South America, North America, and the islands of the sea have been studied, as well as the literature and the laws of Asiatic races. These historians have strangely neglected the literary testimony of European peoples.

In 1901 Prof. F. B. Gummere contributed to the "Furnivall Miscellany" a charming essay on "The Sister's Son" in the English and Scotch ballads. In closing Professor Gummere remarks:

> I think this persistent mention of a sister's son in the ballads something which indeed may not do much for the legal assumption if we take it as an isolated fact, but which, as a part of the cumulative proof furnished by Tacitus, by Germanic legend, by old genealogies, by romance, hints if it does not prove an older law in the case. There are wider fields to search; any one can think of stray instances in Celtic literature; and systematic investigation could doubtless bring additional and welcome evidence from this as well as from other stores of tradition.

There are, indeed, other wider fields to search, and the widest of them is the field of old French literature in general, and more specifically the French epic poetry of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries.

Dr. W. O. Farnsworth's dissertation will not reach the general public, but the theme is well chosen and possesses that human interest the absence of which in many dissertations was recently deplored by your reviewer of the Kittredge Festschrift. The first three chapters of Dr. Farnsworth's monograph contain the evidence he wishes to submit in the form of textual citations with literal translations; the last three chapters contain little that is original, though the author has conveniently reviewed in them the scattered opinions of Hartland, Bachofen, Lang, Kovalesky, Dargun, Westermarck, Schrader, Lippert, and other writers on Mutterrecht. Dr. Farnsworth has thus made himself familiar with the chief authorities in the larger field, and has very amply justified his study of the French epic by showing its wealth of evidence concerning the existence of a sentimental relationship between the mediæval man and his sister's son.

Of any legal recognition of this relationship in old French popular literature there is not a trace. In the centuries when the French epic came into bloom nothing remained of this relationship but a sentiment. How strong this sentiment was, as a literary convention, is a matter upon which there can be no doubt after reading this formidable array of evidence. Indeed, Dr. Farnsworth's evidence is pressed down and running over, and if we would make any comment upon the artistic arrangement of the material, it would be that he is guilty of much needless repetition in marshalling his proofs.

It is sufficient here to recall some of the more notable examples of this relationship in mediæval French literature: King Mark and Tristram; King Arthur and his nephews Lancelot, Gawain, Gahariët, and the unnatural Mordred; the Fisher King and Perceval (Peredur) in the Grail romances; Charlemagne and his nephews Roland and Baudoin; King Louis and Raoul de Cambrai; Simon the butcher and Hugh Capet; Naimon and Ogier le danois; Guillaume d'Orange and his nephews Vivien, Bertrand, etc. As may be seen by consulting E. Langlois's "Table des noms propres, etc." (Paris, 1904), these are but a few examples of this relationship brought out in the biography of old French heroes. The relation of uncle and nephew is the one most often used for purposes of identification in the earliest French narrative poetry, and upon this relation are centred some of the most stirring situations in this poetry. What is true of the Christian heroes is true also of the Saracens and the traitors: Ganelon the traitor in the "Roland" is subsequently provided with a numerous following of nephews. (Cf. Ernst Sauerland, "Ganelon und sein Geschlecht im altfranzösischen Epos," in Stengel's "Ausgaben und Abhandlungen," No. 51.) How epic nephews displace historical sons in the case of Charlemagne may be seen in J. W. Determann's "Epische Verwandschaften im altfranzösischem Volksepos" (Burg, 1887), and in the case of Guillaume d'Orange in J. Bédier's "Les Légendes épiques" (I, 130).

That it was natural for the author of the twelfth-century chansons de geste and romans d'aventure to invent uncles and nephews for their heroes, there can be no doubt. Professor Gummere's remark is as true of the French narrative poetry as it is of the English ballads, that "famous men are provided with a sister's son, while later tradition gives them, or would give them, sons of their own flesh." Why this sentiment, unsupported by law or actual family conditions, persisted with such remarkable force in the subconsciousness of the French is unexplained. Dr. Farnsworth, while reserving an opinion (p. 224), thinks this survival may argue against Professor Bédier's theory of eleventh-century inspiration for the epic, on the ground that poets who did not approach the legendary epic material until that date would not be justified by contemporary custom in their insistence upon this relationship; he opines that the relationship must have its roots in a long tradition regarding these heroes. There is no objection, however, to supposing that poets, when treating for the first time quasi-historical heroes, even in the eleventh and twelfth centuries, should think in terms made conventional by the thought of many generations of Germanic ancestors. The force of the sentiment is later felt in the Italian court poets, Boiardo, Pulci, and Ariosto, who still conventionally insist upon nephew-right as implying special affection, authority, and the obligation of vengeance. Even in Spain, as Dr. Farnsworth points out, there are traces of it in the legends of Bernardo del Carpio and the Siete Infantes de Lara. In this connection it may be further noted that when the Cid marries his two daughters to the two rather suspicious characters, the Infantes de Carrión, he commissions his nephew, Felez Muñoz, to watch over the two brides in loco parentis.

Even the sentiment attached to this relationship weakened under the actual conditions imposed by the accepted Roman laws of inheritance. The sentiment in favor of the sister's son broadened to include the brother's son, and many texts simply used the term "nephew" without qualification. In the latest mediæval popular literature the son comes into his own, and we cease to hear of the nephew's privileges and obligations. But when we speak in terms of centuries, the nephew's literary downfall seems quite sudden. After holding his own for perhaps thirteen centuries of our era, the nephew passed out with the passing of interest in the genealogies of popular narrative poetry where he had made his last stand. Boys still often resemble their maternal uncles in character and in outward favor, but of blood-feuds and inheritances nowadays, point de nouvelles! That later authors are, however, at least sporadically conscious of the force of this bond is shown in the following:

> Marcus, sister's son to Barnabas.
> (Colossians, 4:10.)
> Upon condition, Publius shall not live,
> Who is your sister's son, Mark Antony.
> (Shakespeare, "Julius Cæsar," iv, 1.)
> Where I must strike against the man they call
> My sister's son.
> (Tennyson, "Guinevere," 568.)

And most mediæval of all, in Racine's "Phèdre" (i, 1), where Hippolyte says of the Athenian Princess Aricie:

> Mon père la réprouve; et par des lois sévères
> Il défend de donner des neveux à ses frères.

We have lost a relative who was once closer than a brother; but if any one wishes to find him again, he should go to Dr. Farnsworth's thesis.

CURRENT FICTION.

The Coryston Family. By Mrs. Humphry Ward. New York: Harper & Bros.

Mrs. Ward's voice sounds always fainter and farther away; presently we shall begin to believe it an echo, and not a voice at all. No doubt, the English world which she portrays does still exist, but its existence is a survival; and of her own art she retains little more than the familiar technique.

Some day, perhaps, nineteenth-century fiction in England will be summed up as the Epic of the Dowager. Without the tradition of the dowager the tale of the Coryston family would never have been. From the opening scene Lady Coryston has the "heavy" part, and heavily she plays it. Politics, or party, is the absorbing interest of her life. To her idea of party she is ready to sacrifice justice and fair play, as to her idea of family she is ready to sacrifice husband and children. The husband, an amiable and honorable gentleman, she has dominated from the altar, and though she has finally estranged him, she has so well managed that his death leaves her mistress of the Coryston estates, and the eldest son inherits little but the title. In viewing this situation, Lady Coryston apart, the American reader should try to "see red." To get the English point of view he must regard this diverted inheritance as a species of sacrilege. Lady Coryston should have retired to her dower house, on allowance, while his new lordship, so to speak, took the pot. That she did not is in itself a thrilling circumstance. It frees her from the restricted sphere of the ordinary dowager. She does, of course, go to the unworthy girl whom she suspects of being about to accept her favorite son; but every dowager in fiction must do that as a sign of good faith, just as every villain in melodrama must smoke a cigarette. Lady Coryston is not dependent upon that kind of thing for her effects. She is the monster the world has dreaded—the dowager with the upper hand.

Young Lord Coryston might have been a striking figure if Mrs. Ward had invented him twenty years ago: now he impresses one simply as the ingenuous, eccentric dreamer with whom Messrs. Hewlett, Locke, et al. have sufficiently acquainted us. That the prospective heir to an income of £70,000 a year should not believe in property, might well trouble the person who had the legal disposal of it; but it is because Lord Coryston makes himself politically offensive to her that she disinherits him. The second son, in whose favor a new will is made, then proposes to marry the daughter of a political enemy, and only the physical downfall of his mother prevents him from being cut off in turn. The romance of Marcia, daughter of the house, is quite separate, and involves that question of the yoking together of disagreeing believers, to which we are always likely to find ourselves returning in the pages of Mrs. Ward.

Van Cleve. By Mary S. Watts. New York: The Macmillan Co.

Gen. Nathan Burke was the pattern of a distinguished Ohioan of our grandfathers' time. Van Cleve is a representative Cincinnati citizen of our own day and generation. The history of his second score, virtually coinciding with the eighteen-nineties and the first decade of the twentieth century, is not so stately a performance as Nathan Burke's "biography." And very properly not, for the feat of reviving a bygone literary fashion is obviously uncalled for in the portrayal of a contemporary hero. Consequently the Thackerayan manner, which occasioned much admiration—and some uneasiness—among commentators on the earlier book, is little in evidence in "Van Cleve."

Having defined Van Cleve as a representative Cincinnatian of to-day, we hardly need to add that Van Cleve is a business man. He is, however, no such sublimated specimen of our dominant type as Mr. Dreiser's formidable "Financier." Van Cleve's hardheadedness was, we fear, largely superficial. It chiefly evinced itself in hard work, self-denial, and the honesty that "sweareth to his own hurt and changeth not." Its only domestic manifestation was an occasional protest—never effectual—against chronic impracticality, and it was not incompatible with a large measure of genuine though unostentatious chivalry. Witness his supporting of a thriftless family—grandmother, aunt, cousin, and uncle—in their endless migrations in search of a congenial social atmosphere; also his war-time journey to Cuba, undertaken in behalf only of a girl's reputation, and later the act of conscience by which he precipitated his own financial ruin.

It is rather as the appreciative historian of Ohio manners than as a searching analyst of character or an inventor of absorbingly interesting events that Mrs. Watts excels. We have here a plot that depends entirely upon a manufactured misunderstanding, perfectly transparent to the reader, but, until the last chapters, quite impenetrable to the characters of the story.

Gold. By Stewart Edward White. New York: Doubleday, Page & Co.

Holding to his theory that the individual man's struggle towards perfect adjustment with his environment is the great, impressive drama of life, and that the "sex element" does not necessarily exercise even an instant influence on this great drama, Mr. White has produced a vivid narrative of the days of '49, with only males as its characters and no reference to woman save a bare mention of that "fair sisterhood" which is ever a vanguard of the march to Fortuno's beck.

There is fighting a-plenty in these pages, and there is mighty striving, deeds of bloodshed, thievery, massacre and madness and hope and despair, but the pictures are true—or at least bring with them the conviction of truth. And even in the most exciting passages one must note the lack of the forced and artificial technique that prescribes "dramatic plot" and "sex element" and "artistic balance" and all the rest of the cut-and-dried components of the novel-maker's rule of three.

"Gold" is the first of a promised trilogy. The other books which Mr. White announces he will write will also deal with early days in the West, and will be called "The Gray Dawn" and "The Rose Dawn."

Mother's Son. By Beulah Marie Dix. New York: Henry Holt & Co.

One puts down this novel with surprise that there should be so many Germans in Puritan Boston. At least, one must suppose there are from the account of what befell Elizabeth Willard, author of "The Toy Soldier," after she met Vashti Leissner, herself an author of no small renown, as well as wife of a German-American and mother of a brood of German-American infants. All Germans who came to Boston visited the Leissners, and, of course, when Elizabeth and Mrs. Leissner decided to co-operate as playwrights, Elizabeth met them. She even met the young Herr Lieut. Hugo Waldemar Gunther Mehring, who had unwittingly been the original of "The Toy Soldier," but who had the misfortune to be cashiered and banished to America by his indignant family. He was a pretty boy, and his German friends in Boston who knew his story distrusted him for a Muttersöhnchen and officer. They were much surprised when he actually succeeded in the real estate business, and even succeeded in selling motor-cars. But even then he had difficulty in persuading Elizabeth to marry him, because she was so interested in her books and plays—despite her youth she had a dazzling way of tossing off successful manuscripts at short intervals. In the end, however, Herr Lieut. Hugo Waldemar Gunther Mehring proved to the satisfaction of even his bitterest compatriot and critic, big Julius Hasse, that he was no longer Muttersöhnchen, and convinced Elizabeth that she loved him. But it was necessary for him first to go through the Titanic disaster, which was rather distressing for all concerned.

Partners. By Margaret Deland. New York: Harper & Bros.

Mandy Hinch, keeper with her aged mother of the post office of the little town of Purham, Vt., is reminiscent in her sensitiveness and her retiring disposition of the first of all portraits of the sort, half a century before Miss Wilkins and Sarah Orne Jewett—Hepzibah Pyncheon. In the space of a hundred pages the little book weaves about her the shroud of impending tragedy, and then snatches it away. Thanks to a change of parties at Washington, Mandy is informed that her resignation from the post which for twenty years has been her sole support, is accepted. She somehow manages to keep the full force of the news from the frail old mother, even after William Sprague, the kind-hearted appointee, arrives from Boston. In the dismay which these two feel over the insoluble problem before them, one way of escape plainly presents itself. It is not a hard one for Sprague, whose bachelorhood is not confirmed, and who needs a housekeeper; it is hard for Mandy, sentimentally true to the dead soldier sweetheart of her youth. Mrs. Deland's picture of her women is consistent; the contrast between the great emotional value and the impoverished intellectual worth of their lives gives a kind of poetical interest to the little story.

GENERAL MEADE.

The Life and Letters of George Gordon Meade. By George Meade. Edited by George Gordon Meade. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. Two volumes. $7.50 net.

The most interesting feature of this elaborate life of Gen. Meade, the joint work of his son and grandson, is the remarkable series of letters from Meade to his wife, written, for the most part, during his service in the Mexican War and the Civil War. The letters, hitherto unpublished, not only give an almost daily account of military operations in camp and field, but record also with unrestrained frankness the writer's impressions of his superior officers and military associates, and his opinions of political events as related to the wars.

Meade joined the army in Texas in September, 1845, and served actively until April, 1847. He was opposed at first to the war, believing it to have been "brought on by our injustice to a neighbor, and uncalled-for aggression" (I, 154); and he was long of the opinion that actual hostilities could be avoided. He found Taylor "a plain, sensible old gentleman," laughing at the excitement in the North and scouting the idea of war, and unable, as a stanch Whig and an opponent of Texan annexation, to "enter heart and soul into his present duties" (I, 26). The letters abound in scathing criticism of the volunteers, whom Meade describes as "perfectly ignorant of discipline, and most restive under restraint." Thanks to the "miserable economy of our Government," the waste of ammunition caused by lawless and reckless firing is such that "six months of this volunteer force will cost as much as five years for a regular force of equal size" (I, 91). The policy of Polk is treated with contempt. Meade was not blind to Taylor's limitations as a commander; but for the political machinations which took the conduct of the war out of his hands, planned important movements without consulting him, left him for months without sufficient troops or supplies, and yet threw upon him the odium of incapacity, the letters repeatedly voice condemnation. At the same time, war having begun, his sympathies were with those in Congress, who, like Crittenden and Ingersoll, were for pushing it vigorously despite their hostility to Polk. "Finish the war, and then give it to the Administration," he wrote laconically in February, 1847 (I, 181).

The Civil War letters, which fill the last half of Volume I and the first half of Volume II, form one of the most important contributions to the history of the war that have lately been published. Into the thorny mazes of tactics and strategy, with which the letters abound, and upon which still centre the controversies of military critics, space forbids us to go. In such points Meade's version of his own course, along with the versions of his associates, is authoritatively set forth in the official reports. One is impressed throughout, however, by Meade's seriousness and frankness, his devotion to duty, his clear view of what ought to be done, his vast powers of concentration and work, and his modesty. No more in private than in public did he claim honors or rewards beyond what an impartial judgment would accord him. His letters show him as loyal to his friends and generous in his estimates of his military superiors, but at the same time profoundly distrustful of the politicians at Washington, and bitterly resentful of the persistent efforts of Greeley and others of the press to belittle or censure him. He was first and always a soldier, and upon his conduct he desired a soldier's, and not a civilian's, verdict.

Meade perceived at once the flaw in Wilkes's course in the Trent affair, though doubting if war with England would result. Seward's letter he did not like: "it is specious and pettifogging" (1, 241). For McClellan, under whom he at first served, he had regard and respect, yielded but slowly to the conviction that McClellan's excessive caution unfitted him for high command, and condemned roundly the political intrigues which attended his removal. Of Burnside and Hooker he writes warmly, yet with unerring perception of their faults. The long and dreary controversy over Gettysburg naturally bulks large in these volumes, and on the whole reflects credit on Meade's modesty and poise. He knew what he had done and why he had done it, gave praise or blame to his subordinates as he believed the case warranted, and protested only against the personal attacks of those who would not, or could not, understand why he had not pursued and destroyed Lee's army after defeating it. Of Grant he seems never to have entertained a high opinion, and in the crowning disappointment of his career, the unjust promotion of Sheridan over him, he saw the working-out of personal qualities in Grant whose existence he had early discerned.

For the rest, the work is a comprehensive life of Meade. The letters are briefly annotated where necessary, and are allowed to tell their own story; where they fail, the author and editor supply a well-written narrative. There is a good account of Meade's career from 1847 to 1861, when as an army engineer he was engaged in lighthouse construction and in the survey of the Great Lakes; and his activities as military commander in the South after the war are briefly sketched. About one-third of Volume II is given to an appendix, comprising a few official dispatches and extracts from newspaper articles, together with twenty-four maps of the Gettysburg campaign.

Roads from Rome. By Anne C. E. Allinson. New York: The Macmillan Co. $1.25 net.

"The main purpose of these Roman sketches is to show that the men and women of ancient Rome were like ourselves." Such are the opening words of Mrs. Allinson's preface, and they are justified in the six character-sketches that follow, though we might add that the setting of the stories shows the specific state of life under the early empire quite as much as the common ground of humanity that was the same then as now. There is little action in the stories; they are concerned rather to set forth, in a manner reminiscent of Pater, the self-revelations of character that might come to such men as Catullus and Horace and Mæcenas and Ovid in some critical hour of their lives. To our taste this method succeeds better in the case of a reflective poet like Horace than of a creature of passion and impulse like Catullus, and the chapter called The Phrase Maker is perhaps the most successful in the series—is in itself a refined piece of phrase-making, and something more than that. We cannot give a better idea of the manner of the book than by quoting three paragraphs from the beginning, middle, and end, respectively, of this sketch, with its motto from Horace himself, "Græcia capta ferum victorem cepit":

> But the master of this charming outlook evidently had his mind on something else. He was a man about fifty-five years old, short and stout, and with hair even grayer than his age warranted. As he leaned back among his cushions on a stone bench, so skilfully placed under an ilex tree that his face was protected while the sun fell across his body, he looked an unromantic figure enough, no better than any other Roman gentleman past his prime, seeking the sunshine and intent on physical comfort.

> But now, like the phantom in Brutus's tent at Philippi, a grim question stole upon him out of the shadows of his memory. Was it possible that his fight on that field of defeat had been, not a folly, but the golden moment of his life? Had Athens taught him something even profounder than the art which had made him Rome's best lyric poet? He had forgotten much of her humiliation, and of his own Roman pride in her subjection during those days when he had lived, in youthful hero-worship, with the spirits of her great past. Had she, after all, not only taught the sons of her masters philosophy and the arts, but taken them captive, as well, by the imperious ideals of her own youth, by her love of freedom and of truth?

> "Davus," he called out, "make haste. I have had a visit from the shades, and it has been as unpleasant as those cold baths the doctor makes me take." Then, as he saw the look of fright on the wrinkled face of the old slave who had been with his father when he died, he broke into a laugh and put his hand on his shoulder. "Calm yourself, my good fellow," he said, "we shall all be shades some day, and to-day I feel nearer than usual to that charming state. But in the meantime there is a chance for Bacchus and the Muses. Tell them to get out a jar of Falernian to-night, and do you unroll Menander. The counsels of the divine Plato are too eternal for my little mind. And, Davus," he added thoughtfully, as he rose and leaned on the slave's willing arm, "as soon as we get to the house, write down, 'Greece took her captors captive.' That has the making of a good phrase in it—a good phrase. I shall polish it up and use it some day."

Such is the manner of the book, but its interest is greater than can be shown in any extracts. There is no sense of effort in the writing, and no harsh pedantry in the details. As one reads, it is as if one were wafted in a pleasant dream back to the Rome of Cæsar and Augustus and to the Athenian schools of the philosophers.

A New Government for the British Empire. By F. W. Bussell, D.D. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. $1.25 net.

The vice-principal of Brasenose possesses the art of being severe without being unparliamentary. In common with the rest of mankind, he "lacks the method of drawing up an indictment against a whole people." Yet he is able to make out a damaging case. Reasons for anxiety may, he says, be summed up as follows: the dangerous rivalry of interests, sectional conflict, a landless people, an aggrieved industrial proletariat, professional statesmen, threatened retirement from public business of a still influential and trusted class, premiums on official and expert services, disappearance of gratuitous duties issuing out of the life of ordinary citizens, ubiquitous distrust of direct consultation of the people, deadlock of government by equally divided parties, increasing use of coercion, and complete decay of moral force in the state. To these symptoms of a thoroughly unhealthy condition may be added the universal lack of respect for authority.

Such a bill of particulars would be disheartening were it not suggested throughout this work that the real character of the British nation remains sound, despite the fact that all public and political influences, methods, and vocabulary are alike demoralizing. The difficulty is that an entirely false view is given by the insincere rancor of party spirit. "Friendly intercourse between the classes," we are informed, "is still the rule in actual life; but we may easily drift into civil war some day, because we are so often told that we are already engaged in it." In other words, the bitterness of Parliament and party (though often fictitious) can easily be reflected with disastrous effect on the whole national life. This position, it is maintained, is owing, not to the supposed application of "democracy," but to the fact that no effort is made to apply it at all.

There is nothing novel in such a presentation of contemporary British affairs. These views have been expressed time and again, but seldom with such sound learning and such genuine philosophical reflection. The work before us is scholarly without being academic, strenuous without being noisy, large without ignoring the littleness of human existence. While seemingly revolutionary, it really preaches a return to first principles. It demands an extensive system of devolution—without that democracy will always remain what it is to-day, an empty imposture, disguising absolute government in an anonymous and peculiarly distasteful form; as precarious in tenure as the older despotisms, and far less dignified, continuous, and efficient in its policy.

What is really needed? First, the dissolution of the Commons, only in name a predominant or popular chamber; next, the devolution of local power to four or five provincial assemblies; then, the creation of an imperial Senate, to be erected on the foundations of the House of Lords, insensibly passing out of the chrysalis of pure heredity into wider interests and usefulness; finally, an enlargement or restoration of the influence of the sovereign.

King Edward as I Knew Him. Reminiscences of Five Years' Personal Attendance upon His Late Majesty, King Edward the VII. By C. W. Stamper. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co. $2 net.

As a work of unconscious humor, this deserves more than casual notice. Seldom has the innocent flunkeyism which doth hedge about a king more quaintly recorded itself. This is not to reflect upon the author's social standing. He was not, as report has had it, the King's chauffeur, but his motor expert, who was in charge of all the royal cars. He never drove the King, but always had a seat beside the chauffeur, in order to direct him, and to be on hand in case of accident. As there was no room for a footman, the duties of that functionary devolved upon him. But they might have devolved upon any of the King's gentlemen in similar circumstances, and the flunkeyism of these reminiscences is not essentially different from that which any of them might show if he were to take to print.

That Mr. Stamper has a genuine reverence for the memory of his former employer there is no manner of doubt. The amusing thing is that he does not suspect how little likely his narrative is to induce reverence in his readers. He honestly believes that the King "was a great man and had great ways." But the ways here recorded are the little ways of an ordinary man. By their testimony the late King must appear to Mr. Stamper's readers as an old gentleman who had been spoiled all his life and could but remain spoiled to the end; a good-natured old gentleman when nothing interfered with his personal plans or comfort; a martinet in the conduct of his household; a kindly master, for the most part, in speech and manner, but without consideration for his servants when his own convenience was in question; a man who attracted people, but not because of any exceptional fineness in his own nature or carriage: a "good fellow," in terms of royalty. He had, says Mr. Stamper, "a keen sense of humor." These pages show it broad rather than keen, and continually at variance with courtesy and consideration for others. Harry Lauder is his ideal of humor on the stage. The King goes to see him and "laughs a great deal"; the next day he says to his motor expert, "Put your hat on, Stamper. Did you like the play last night?" "Very much indeed, your Majesty." "Yes, I thought you would, because you would understand it. It was really very good, very funny."

He loved to play little practical jokes on the persons who served him, gentle or simple, and never lost the chance of twitting a victim. He loved the slapstick touch in everyday life. When Stamper seizes a horse by the bridle to get him out of the way of the car, and is lifted off his feet, the King is convulsed with mirth. Physical mishaps arouse in him the delight of the small boy or the music-hall audience. Stamper dances down a lot of gillies at a tenants' ball at Balmoral. "My discomfiture of the Scotchmen greatly amused his Majesty. 'Look at Stamper,' I heard him cry, 'just look at him!' A moment later I slipped and fell, which made his Majesty roar with laughter."

The King must have everything go according to schedule. "Stamper" was responsible if anything went wrong: then would Majesty lift its voice and complain that Stamper was always making mistakes. The motor expert boasts, however, that "he never saw the King lose his temper with any but those who knew him and whom he knew well"—which, reduced to unroyal terms, would seem to be much like saying that Smith was always a perfect gentleman—except at home.

Notes

The Century Co. will soon have ready: Theodore Dreiser's "A Traveler at Forty"; an "Advanced American History," by S. E. Forman, and "Beyond the Pasture Bars," a new school reader by Dallas Lore Sharp.

Among the books which Putnams issue this week are "Folk-Ballads of Southern Europe," by Sophie Jewett, and "Little Stories by Big Men," compiled by Annabel Lee.

The same house has in press "The Sonnets of William Shakespeare, New Light and Old Evidence," by the Countess de Chambrun, and "The Story of the World," by Elizabeth O'Neill.

A third collection of stories by L. P. Jacks is promised next week by Holt. The same house will publish later in the season Inez Haynes Gillmore's novel "Angel Island."

A forthcoming book in the list of George W. Jacobs & Company is a "Life of Admiral Semmes," by Colyer Meriwether.

Smith & Elder are bringing out Sir Sidney Lee's inaugural at East London College, entitled "The Place of English Literature in the Modern University."

Mr. Hilaire Belloc has translated into English "The Romance of Tristan and Iseult" from the French of Joseph Bédier. M. Bédier's version, made up of fragmentary French poems of the twelfth century and later variations, was crowned by the French Academy. The translation will be published by Messrs. Allen.

Mr. R. O. Winstedt is preparing for the Oxford University Press a "Malay Grammar." It will be the first work of the kind in English.

The following are additions which Dutton makes this autumn to Everyman's Library: "Life of the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone," by G. W. E. Russell; "Life in Mexico," by Mme. Calderon de la Barca; Dostoievsky's "The Idiot"; "The Fall of Constantinople, or Theodora Phranza," by the late Dr. T. M. Neale; Balzac's "Lost Illusions," with an introduction by George Saintsbury; R. L. Stevenson's "An Inland Voyage" and "Travels with a Donkey"; "A Century of Essays," an enlarged Æsop, being a collection of fables; Swedenborg's "Divine Providence," specially translated under the auspices of the Swedenborg Society, and an Atlas dealing with Africa and Australasia and embracing a period from the Pyramids to the present.

Books in preparation by the Oxford University Press include: "A Glossary of Tudor and Stuart Words," by W. W. Skeat, completed by A. L. Mayhew; Map's "De Nugis Curialium," edited by M. R. James; "Studies of the Odyssey," by J. A. K. Thomson; "Concise Dante Dictionary," by Paget Toynbee; "Catalogue of Coins in the Punjab Museum, Lahore," by R. B. Whitehead, and in the World's Classic series Miss M. Betham-Edwards's "The Lord of the Harvest."

Sir James Murray is seeking, for the "New English Dictionary," to fill up some gaps in the history of the word "transept." He would be glad to get examples of it before Leland (1540), or between Leland and Anthony Wood (1692), or a Latin form of any age in actual use—that is, not in modern dictionaries which may have simply invented or inferred it.

"The Youth of Goethe" (Dutton), by P. Hume Brown, is the work not of a specialist in German literature, but of a distinguished Scottish historian whose previous essays in biography have concerned themselves with his fellow-countrymen, George Buchanan and John Knox. "The Youth of Goethe" is written with this historian's accustomed accuracy, knowledge of the sources of information, and judicial sobriety. So thoroughly normal is the composition of the book that no one quality is conspicuous. Dr. Brown does not profess to fill a gap, nor does he notably add to the literature on his subject already easily accessible in German. He does, however, give one of the most orderly accounts in English of a many-sided personality, and to the narrative of Goethe's early life he properly correlates an exhibit of Goethe's writings up to and including the "Urfaust."

The two English writers to whom the Nobel prize for literature has been awarded in the dozen years since its foundation are both natives of India. Rabindranath Tagore, the recipient of this year's honor, is a native of Bengal. His predecessor, Rudyard Kipling, is a native of Bombay. If Kipling is spoken of as an Anglo-Indian author because he wrote in English of an India which he has made his own, it is equally proper to apply the term Anglo-Indian to Tagore, whose present fame has come to him as a poet in the English tongue; but with this difference, that the India of Tagore is, naturally, far more real than the highly romanticized and dramaticized land which goes by the name of Kipling's India. The poems with which Tagore has so rapidly come to the front were written originally in the Bengali tongue, but the author has himself rendered them into an idiomatic English.

The Nation has already expressed at some length its opinion of the work of Rabindranath Tagore, in reviewing (May 15) his volume of prose-poems entitled "Gitanjali," and there is little more to be said in regard to his more recent volume, "The Gardener" (Macmillan). The present collection of "lyrics of love and life," as he calls them, were for the most part written much earlier than the "Gitanjali," and show rather the mysticism implicit in the modern Hindu's notion of love than the love implicit in his practice of mysticism. They are pretty and gentle and shot through occasionally with deeper meanings, as may be judged from these two fair specimens:

19.

You walked by the riverside path with the full pitcher upon your hip.

Why did you swiftly turn your face and peep at me through your fluttering veil?

That gleaming look from the dark came upon me like a breeze that sends a shiver through the rippling water and sweeps away to the shadowy shore.

It came to me like the bird of evening that hurriedly flies across the lampless room from the one open window to the other, and disappears in the night.

You are hidden as a star behind the hills, and I am a passer-by upon the road.

But why did you stop for a moment and glance at my face through your veil while you walked by the riverside path with the full pitcher upon your hip?

One morning in the flower garden a blind girl came to offer me a flower chain in the cover of a lotus leaf.

I put it round my neck, and tears came to my eyes.

I kissed her and said, "You are blind even as the flowers are.

"You yourself know not how beautiful is your gift."

In the uniform edition of Anatole France's works in English now appears "The Opinions of Jérôme Coignard," competently translated by Mrs. Wilfrid Jackson (Lane). Not the least delightful portion of this volume is the introductory chapter in which the author gives us an exquisite appreciation of his earlier presentation of Monsieur Coignard in that rare book, "At the Sign of the Reine Pédauque." In those earlier "memoirs" the mellow philosophical rascal lives again, says our author, "as Socrates does in the Memorabilia of Xenophon. . . . It is a work that makes one think of those portraits of Erasmus by Holbein that one sees in the Louvre, at Bâle, or at Hampton Court, the delicacy of which never wearies the sense of appreciation." "The Opinions," less distinctively a work of imagination, is cast in the form of dialogues and conversations held by the genial ecclesiastic as he drank his pint at the Petit Bacchus or turned over a volume of Cassiodorus at the book shop of Monsieur Blaizot. Coignard is a good Catholic; for the rest, he is Anatole France applying his suavely cynical criticism to governments, science, the army, academies, revolutions, historians, and the idea of justice.

In April, 1900, ex-President Cleveland delivered two addresses at Princeton, inaugurating the Lectureship on Public Affairs which Henry Stafford Little, an alumnus of the University, had endowed in his honor. The subject of these first lectures was "The Independence of the Executive." The next spring he lectured twice on "The Venezuelan Boundary Controversy," and two years later he gave a lecture on "The Government in the Chicago Strike." These lectures have now been published in three small volumes by the Princeton University Press. The natural interest of the topics they discuss was enhanced by the circumstance that the lecturer had played a leading part in the events considered. This circumstance gives the volumes the value attaching to first-hand historical material.

David Starr Jordan's "War and Waste" (Doubleday, Page) is described in a prefatory note as a series of addresses, essays, and editorials having the purpose of opposition to war, to war scares, and to war accessories in general. The title address was delivered at the Harvard Union in 1911. The other papers are reprinted from the World's Work, the Atlantic, the Independent, and other journals, some of them published abroad. A few of the titles are "The Pest of Glory," "The Net of the Usurer," "Fort Graft," "The Dream of Universal War," "Anti-Alien Legislation in California," and "The American Peace Policy."

We have more than once expressed appreciation of the Home University Library of Modern Knowledge (Holt), the new titles of which bring the total up to seventy-two volumes. "From Jefferson to Lincoln," by Prof. William McDonald, of Brown University, is a sketch of our national history as related mainly to three lines of development, constitutional growth, the growth of the party system, and slavery. "Germany of To-day," by Charles Tower, gives about half of its two hundred and fifty pages to various features of the mechanism of the Government, the Kaiser, the Reichstag, police, law courts, armed forces, imperial finance, etc., and the remainder to such topics as education, industrial organization, agriculture, and the intellectual life. Dr. J. B. Bury, the well-known historian of the Later Roman Empire, contributes "A History of Freedom of Thought." The somewhat bitter spirit which Dr. Bury allows to crop out here and there against religious intolerance seems not entirely in accord with his clear recognition, on pages 55 and 56, that some influence or other had chilled to practical extinction the earlier growth of Greek science generations before the influence of Christianity had entered the field. It is quite possible that modern civilization had to slough off something more than mere theological obscurantism before the sun of modern intellectual freedom could shine forth.

That the editors of the Home University do not take its limitation to "modern knowledge in any narrow spirit is shown by the inclusion of such subjects as Miss Jane E. Harrison's "Ancient Art and Ritual," the aim of which is to show that "these two divergent developments have a common root, and that neither can be understood without the other. It is at the outset one and the same impulse that sends a man to church and to the theatre." This birth of art "by way of ritual out of emotion" leads the author naturally to considerable concessions to present-day "Expressionists," but it is doubtless a mere trick of typographical depravity which makes her say that art should come "out of life keenly and vividly livid." Dr. William T. Councilman, of Harvard University, writes of "Disease and Its Causes" in a way to be of great practical value to any intelligent reader, though of course the work is not intended as a "family doctor-book." He cautions the devotees of eugenics that there is as yet an "excess of theory and dearth of facts" in their science, and that attempts to influence heredity should be limited strictly to heredity of disease. "Plant Life," by J. Bretland Farmer, professor of botany in the Imperial College of Science and Technology, of London, deals with plant form from the point of view of function. The main thesis in "The Origin and Nature of Life," by Benjamin Moore, professor of bio-chemistry in the University of Liverpool, is that the hiatus between the non-living and the living is bridged not at a level of bacteria or animalculæ, where the search for the passage has been invariably unsuccessful, but at a depth of life beyond the reach of the microscope and possessing a unit lower than the living cell, as we conceive of that cell from the tissues of animals and plants. These volumes are sold at fifty cents each.

Discussion of Hamlet's mental condition has for the moment been eclipsed by similar searchings as to Strindberg. The latter presents a less interesting problem, though scarcely less perplexing. If Strindberg could be dismissed summarily with the title of fool, in which light he frequently enough appeared, much would be gained, for we cannot feel that any real profit can be got by reading his works. But in the background of his nature it is easy to see the spectre of greatness. He combined in an extraordinary way resolute idealism with impulsive fear. Of a sudden he was prone to be overcome by a sense of terror at his unconventional position and to wish for death; at other times he was sickened by the incongruity of his visions and the facts of life, and gave up the struggle out of hand. In the midst, for instance, of one of his many amours, he was impressed by its sordidness, and, with all the heroics of the Romanticist, attempted suicide. An account of this adventure is found in a volume which has just appeared from the Appletons' press, "August Strindberg, The Spirit of Revolt: Studies and Impressions," by L. Lind-af-Hageby:

He undresses by the shore, throws himself into the cold water, and swims out into the open sea. After a struggle with the waves, he returns exhausted. Beckoning Fate to do her worst, he then climbs an alder tree in a state of perfect nudity. The icy October gale responds, and, when he descends shivering, he is satisfied with the first part of the expiatory act.

Without pursuing the analogy to Hamlet further, for Hamlet never did anything quite so silly as this, even with a "method," it may be noted that Strindberg found in this Danish prince a kindred soul. Miss Lind-af-Hageby has set forth the facts of Strindberg's life with much fulness and without any desire to excuse her subject of great moral blame. Towards the literary works she is a bit less critical, though showing none of the unthinking adulation with which the book market has lately been flooded. The question which each critic of the Swede should ask himself is, Did Strindberg write anything which is not vitiated by his mental confusion?

Another work, this by Strindberg himself, comes to us from Putnams, "The Red Room," a book which was first published in 1879, and which gave its author his first literary prominence. Though in the form of a novel, the book is sufficiently autobiographical to warrant brief mention at this place. The hero, Arvid Falk, a journalist, is, of course, Strindberg, here represented as an idealist who undergoes a series of crushing disillusions. Every phase of Swedish society is satirized, the author finding embodiments of the Seven Deadly Sins. Respectability is proved to be a sham under which the banker, the publisher, the clergy, carry on their corrupt practices. The contrast with this picture of wretched time-serving is furnished by the occupants of the Red Room of a restaurant, where gather artists of all sorts struggling by their wits to eke out an existence. That most of them fail argues not their incompetence, but the brutality of the world. Some of the sketches have undeniable keenness, for Strindberg always saw concretely. This quality contributed both his strength and his weakness as a writer. It was noted so long ago as 1884 by Björnson: "He has been a pietist, and so he is still, in spite of many experiences—not religiously, but morally. A cause is for him only persons; bring them out, whip them."

Miss Margaret Ladd Franklin's bibliography, "The Case for Woman Suffrage," is marked by accurate workmanship and sober discrimination. About four hundred titles of books and pamphlets, thirty-three Congressional reports (1874-1912), twenty-four plays, nearly six hundred articles in periodicals, fifty-five leaflets in series published by the National American Woman Suffrage Association, and eleven current suffrage periodicals—the first four divisions arranged chronologically, the latter two alphabetically, and all together representing the opinion of twenty-three centuries, from Plato down—here is a bristling arsenal for propagandists, alike friends and adversaries of the ideas preached by the National College Equal Suffrage League, which is sponsor for the book. The task of the agitator will be lightened by the full index to authors' names, but especially by the rating attached to a large number of the entries. The laurels are awarded to Wendell Phillips, Mill, Higginson, and Mrs. Charlotte Perkins Gilman. Only next in importance are the utterances of David G. Ritchie, Lady Grove, and Max Eastman; and after these follow, among others, Ibsen, Mrs. Putnam, Jacobi, Veblen, Prof. William I. Thomas, Lydia E. Bekker, Professor Cairns, Mrs. Olive Schreiner, and Miss M. Carey Thomas, the last of whom writes the introduction to the volume. As a rule, the estimates are corroborated by an analysis of book or article or by a significant excerpt. If terse finalities of judgment occur, such as "platitudes" or "too bitter for present persuasiveness," or "flippant, yet without wit," they prove the compiler a rational woman, and leave her devotion as a suffragist unimpugned. What makes this bibliography a readable book in large part is the sense of humor betrayed in the critical comments. The opinions quoted fairly reveal the growth of the movement, from Mill's summing up in 1869: "We have had the morality of submission and the morality of chivalry and generosity; the time is now come for the morality of justice," to F. H. Barrow's in 1908: "Our chief plea . . . for woman suffrage is not that she is now denied a right . . . but that the time is ripe for her to be called on to bear her share of social responsibility." With this sweep of thought, one wonders why Ellen Key, the emotional expounder of the feminist argument from responsibility, has not been included.

Rear-Admiral A. T. Mahan's "Major Operations of the Navies in the War of American Independence," which was first published fifteen years ago as a chapter in the "History of the Royal Navy," an English work in seven volumes under the general editorship of Sir William Laird Clowes, is now reprinted by Little, Brown & Co., without material change. It is written in the author's well-known authoritative manner and the style of presentation is concise and telling. It is not, however, a history of the American navy in the Revolution. One must not look in it for an account of naval organization, or of the achievement of such ships as were sent to engage in individual enterprises against the mistress of the sea. Not even the brilliant career of John Paul Jones is mentioned. The probable reason is that Jones's achievements were not regarded as major operations. The British writers have contended that Jones was a privateer, or even a pirate; but one cannot believe that the distinguished American officer would countenance so uncharitable a view towards a man who in fighting spirit was the one glory of the American navy of the Revolution. The author wishes to show us the importance of sea power in our struggle for independence. He gives chapters to Arnold's defence of Lake Champlain, the British attack on Charleston in 1776, with other operations on the coast, the effect of Howe's Philadelphia campaign on the Saratoga campaign, and the operations of the navy on the coast in connection with the defence of New York, Rhode Island, Georgia, and the Carolinas. Besides these chapters there is an extended account of the operations of British and French fleets in the second half of the war, in both the Atlantic and the Indian Oceans. Considering the purpose for which the book was originally written, it is not surprising that it is chiefly a history of British naval operations in our Revolutionary War. In a brief introduction, which is written expressly for the present American reprint, Rear-Admiral Mahan points out two lessons of the war, in fact, of all wars. They are that war, once begun, is likely to spread much farther than was at first expected, and that the best means of defending a nation in war is to be ready on the sea. The latter argument, for which the author is widely known, continually reappears in the body of the book. In order to support the narrative of naval events on the Atlantic Coast, an outline of land operations is introduced. It is very brief, and contains no new matter. In fact, the reviewer has discovered one error. The commander of the loyalists at Moore's Creek (p. 31) was Donald McDonald and the husband of Flora McDonald was named Allan. But such a slip is unimportant in a book which within its scope is sane and scholarly.

In Norris A. Brisco's "Economics of Business" (Macmillan) a commendable effort has been made to express, in clear and simple language, the fundamental principles underlying business enterprises. This was made possible only by a thorough study of the methods which have been practiced in the successful management of business ventures, and by the careful examination of the large volume of recent literature which treats of the various phases of business itself. After outlining the economic basis of business, the author proceeds to a discussion of such questions as usually are considered in present-day works on corporations and scientific management. Here are included, among other topics, the types of business organizations, the principles of scientific management, the function of the entrepreneur, the analysis of cost accounting, factory and labor efficiency, buying and selling, and the principles and mediums of advertising. The work is adapted to meet the twofold purpose of serving as a textbook for classes in business administration as well as to assist business men in their efforts to obtain greater efficiency in their special lines of work.

After having written on the love affairs of Madame de Staël, George Sand, Byron, Shelley, and Catherine the Great, Mr. Francis Gribble must have been hard pressed to find a heroine whose amatory exploits would not appear in the nature of anti-climax. There remained Messalina and Isabella II of Spain. For the moment Messalina is neglected in favor of the young queen who "danced away her throne"—"The Tragedy of Isabella II" (Badger). "Not only was her love of dancing excessive," says Mr. Gribble, "her choice of partners was unfortunate." No more so, perhaps, than Mr. Gribble's choice of subjects. Lovers of the prurient may open this volume with full confidence that every detail relating to the dancing and the partners will be therein treated. For Mr. Gribble holds that "the scandals must be realized in order that the political movements may be understood." Perhaps a truer statement of the author's method would be that it is necessary to introduce a few dry facts of history for the better understanding of the scandals, for the book contains little else. In his use of sources Mr. Gribble is wholly uncritical. He relies in large part upon the back-stairs gossip printed in the partisan press of the day and upon the lively imaginings of contemporary foreign tourists. Many of these narratives are obviously false, but they serve to make history readable. A few errors and misprints have crept into the text.

The panics upon which F. W. Hirst, the editor of the Economist, has written in "Six Panics and Other Essays" (London: Methuen), have nothing to do with finance. The panics are all over an "invasion of England" by a foreign Power. The first was caused by an alarmist letter written to the Times by the aged Duke of Wellington in 1847 as to the utterly unprotected state of England's coast and the danger of a French invasion. The second followed a very few years later (1851-1853), and this, together with the third (1859-1861), was also over "the French." The fourth was in connection with Stead's famous "Navy Scare" in 1884. By this time the French bogey had relinquished the centre of the stage and the fourth alarm was not specific as to the particular enemy. Germany, however (in 1906), loomed up as the foreign foe and caused the Dreadnought panic with its "We want eight, we won't wait" chorus—much the most expensive panic of the series. The latest, which belongs indeed to the present year, is the "Airship Panic," when, in February and March last, people in England affected to believe that German airships were nightly surveying the northeast coast! This one fitly crowns the series. Mr. Hirst's descriptions of the six are full of humor, but there is throughout his writing on this subject, a sæva indignatio against the whole business of manufacturing war-scares which well becomes so stanch a disciple of Cobden and Bright. Many times he charges directly and indirectly that these things are deliberately worked up by the "ring" of manufacturers of war material; perhaps this is the main defect in his perspective, for it is impossible to credit these people with such great power and such remarkable ingenuity as he seems to attribute to them. Nevertheless, these essays are a powerful corrective to the infection of "Jingoism" and may be cordially recommended to those who are fortunate enough not to remember too far back in the past. The volume contains besides the "panic" essays, and an enthusiastic appreciation of John Bright, an interesting paper on Friedrich List, who is described as the "Father of the German Zollverein," and a discussion of English newspapers. There is a pleasant flavor of scholarship about Mr. Hirst's writing; he belongs to the school of the classical economists of the mid-nineteenth century and shows that it is still possible to write of latter-day finance in the language of Bagehot.

Miss M. E. Hirst's little book on "The Story of Trusts" (London: Collins' Clear-Type Press) is an excellent introduction to the subject for the general reader who wants a bird's-eye view of the world-wide tendency towards industrial combination so marked within the last twenty years. In the space of some 250 small pages she contrives to pack a great deal of information. The chapters on Trusts in England and Government Monopolies are particularly interesting to the American reader who, judging from the account of Trusts in America, which is on the whole accurate in its details, will feel some confidence in what he reads of the rest of the world. The chapter on Trusts and Tariffs makes it clear where the author's sympathies lie; she points out in passing that Russia of all European countries "has surrounded herself with the highest tariff wall —an average ad valorem duty of 131 per cent. According to the estimate of a recent investigator Russia has also created a record in Trusts. M. Leroux-Zuyeff declares that there are at least nineteen hundred Trusts and syndicates in different parts of the Empire." This chapter is headed by Mr. Havemeyer's famous remark, "The tariff is the mother of Trusts." The chapter on Unpopularity of Trusts is perhaps the least satisfactory in Miss Hirst's book. It discloses more animus than do the others. We note in it the curious misstatement that the so-called Coal Trust "compelled the independent mines who had no other carriers to sell their output to these companies at 65 per cent. of the average market price" (italicization ours). It was at 65 per cent. of the average tidewater price—a very different thing, for it included the rate of transportation, the railway taking the 35 per cent. as its rate.

James Carter Beard, illustrator and author, died Saturday at his home in New Orleans, La., aged seventy-six. He was born in Cincinnati. In the work of illustration he made a specialty of pictures of animal life. As an author he is remembered for "Little Workers," "Curious Homes and Their Tenants," and "Billy Possum."

THE INVENTOR OF ANTISEPSIS.

Lord Lister, His Life and Work. By G. T. Wrench, M.D. (Lond.). New York: Frederick A. Stokes Co. $4.50 net.

The very simplicity of the life of Lister makes the task of the biographer anything but easy. Here is no gripping story of a man who overcame adverse social conditions, no picturesque rise from penury to professional prominence and royal favor. When Joseph Lister was born in 1827 at West Ham, just outside the London of that day, it was into comfortable conditions and a Quaker environment. His father, like his father before him, was a wine merchant, but also a man of much talent who did a great service in improving the construction of lenses for microscopes. Educated in a good Quaker school, young Lister went to University College in 1845, and two years later passed to University College Hospital and its medical school. Here he came especially under the influence of Sharpey, who seems to have done much to give Lister scientific interests and that insight into method which was later so helpful to him. After his graduation and some hospital experience, Sharpey sent him, at the age of twenty-five, to Syme, at Edinburgh, one of the great surgeons of the world.

Lister went to Scotland in 1852 as a visitor, but he soon became Syme's house surgeon, and later, in 1856, his son-in-law, and remained in the north twenty-five years. In 1860 he went to Glasgow as a professor of surgery, returning to Edinburgh nine years later to serve as professor of clinical surgery. In 1877 he took a similar position at King's College Hospital in London, holding it until 1893, when he reached the prescribed age of retirement. In 1883 he had been made a baron and was raised to the peerage in 1897. Lady Lister, long his constant companion and a devoted helper in his scientific and literary work, had died in 1893, leaving no children. Lord Lister himself died in 1912, after being much enfeebled for eight or ten years.

When Lister's eightieth birthday came it was proposed to collect his papers and publish them as a memorial of the master. This was accomplished by a small committee of his friends, and in 1909 two stately volumes issued from the Clarendon Press, carrying not everything which Lister had printed, but all which he held to have abiding interest or cared to have preserved outside of his contributions to several large treatises on surgery. The introduction to these memorial volumes contained some biographical information and an appreciation of the work there recorded. There was still abundant opportunity for a fuller account. This story Dr. Wrench, himself an ardent Listerian, has written, and, all things considered, has written it well.

Lister was an excellent teacher and a good surgeon, but neither his teaching nor his operative skill would have given him much more than a local reputation. He was also a careful and enthusiastic investigator, having been well trained by an excellent physiologist. Wrench rather overrates the value of these experimental researches, and few will accept his opinion that Lister was a profounder philosopher than Pasteur. The experimental work was, however, of the utmost immediate value in aiding Lister to apply the teaching of Pasteur to the burning problem of the proper treatment of wounds. Here it was that the genius of Lister showed itself, not in recognizing the importance of the problem, for every surgeon whose mind reached beyond the edge of his scalpel knew that, but in perceiving that the doctrines of Pasteur showed the way to the solution.

To realize the seriousness of this problem is nowadays hard. So accustomed are we to the salubrity of the modern hospital and to the comparative safety of operations that few of us appreciate what a different place a hospital was fifty years ago. It was then almost actually dangerous to have an operation performed, even in the best of hospitals. The chances of the patient were better in his own home, or in the open air, as the experience of American surgeons in the Civil War abundantly demonstrated, although the significance of this fact was but slowly recognized, and even now is not known to Dr. Wrench. The mortality of cases operated on in the great hospitals of Europe (or of America, for that matter) was appalling. Pyæmia and hospital gangrene abounded in the surgical wards, and the glow of erysipelas was everywhere. Some of the most distinguished operators were obliged from time to time to close up considerable parts of hospitals, even in the case of comparatively new buildings, in order to try some form of house-cleaning in the hope of changing the unfavorable conditions, but with no clear knowledge of what these conditions really were. Those who care for figures illustrative of this state of affairs will find some in this book, particularly those compiled by Sir James Simpson, but for greater detail should look in Lister's articles or read the story as told by some of the German surgeons, for example Lindpainter (Deutsche Zeitschrift für Chirurgie, VII, 187).

Such conditions existed also in the Infirmary when Lister went to Glasgow, and under such conditions he worked there. It was not, however, until early in 1865 that his attention was clearly directed to a possible connection between the existing surgical troubles and the questions of putrefaction discussed by Pasteur nearly two years earlier. Lister at once began to seek some method of destroying the microbes of a wound by chemicals and some means of keeping the wound from the air which was supposed to carry the microbes. There is reason for thinking that the earlier experiments were made with various sulphites, but this is not set forth here, or in the collected articles. Be that as it may, Lister very soon took up carbolic acid, which was just then in favor as a deodorizer of sewage, and so presumably was a destroyer of putrefaction. Success was not immediate, but on the 12th of August, 1865, came the first really good results, and this is the birthday of Listerism and antisepsis and all that follows.

The first application of the method was to compound fractures in which a portion of a broken bone protrudes through the skin, conditions peculiarly favorable to the entrance of dirt and microbes. Later the method was extended to abscesses, and with such success that a further extension to actual operations naturally followed, leading ultimately to new operations, such as not even the most reckless had been willing to undertake. Along with this progress went the development of highly complex methods of bandaging to keep out the air, bearer of microbes, and presently the adoption of a spray of carbolic acid to prevent the access of microbes during the operation, or while changing bandages. Wrench tries to make it appear that the spray was not really a part of Lister's scheme and that he adopted it more because of his good nature in accepting a suggestion than from any belief in its efficacy. It is true that he became skeptical about the spray in a few years, but he did not abandon it until about 1887 after using it above fifteen years; Schultze says they were spraying in Edinburgh in October, 1871. He gives also a full account of the antiseptic bandage and the way it came about, and at some length derides the modern system of asepsis, with its endless complexity. This complexity comes from the recognition that scrupulous care is required to keep away the microbes found on the surface of the body of the patient or on insufficiently cleaned instruments, or, again, in the hands and person of the operator, and thus to preserve aseptic conditions. The doctrine of antisepsis postulated the internal air as the carrier of germs by which the wound or its secretions might be contaminated; it also demanded careful and special cleansing of hands and instruments, but not with the scrupulosity of the aseptic system.

Wrench declares that asepsis shows even less good results than antisepsis, in the fully developed Listerian method, and should be abandoned. That opens up a large question which can hardly be discussed here. In a measure, he is perhaps right, however, in urging that the aseptic system is becoming overloaded and topheavy, and lacks the adaptability of the simpler Listerism. The truth probably lies somewhere between the two extremes, and there is a real danger of making too much of certain details and losing one's self among them. One needs what has been carelessly called an "antiseptic conscience," but one needs most of all a clear understanding of the fundamental principles as Lister insisted again and again. It is perhaps worth while to remind the reader that, now that the obscurity of the sources of infection has been largely removed, the fundamental principles of antisepsis and asepsis are really the same. Given an aseptic field of operation, asepsis strives to keep it clean, but when the field is presumably septic some form of antisepsis must be adopted; it need not, however, have the full complexity of the original Listerism, and it is perfectly clear that the free use of carbolic acid has many limitations; in fact, Lister himself early declared that the antiseptic means might be very various.

The successful outcome of the application of the antiseptic treatment in Glasgow and Edinburgh was in itself a great victory, but with it came a period of anxiety. This is perhaps the most interesting part of the story of Lister because of the opposition which his new method aroused, and because of the patience and quiet persistence with which he passed through these trials. Not only was he long without honor in his own country, but in other lands the message fell for a time on deaf ears. The message had been delivered first in 1867, and speedily some operators began to use carbolic acid and sought to do as Lister did, but mostly with unsatisfactory results. Only a few had sufficiently grasped the principles involved to succeed and became real and successful Listerians. It was in Germany that the triumph of Listerism soonest became general, but the course of events was not exactly that which Wrench gives, as the reader may easily see if he take up the address given by A. W. Schultze early in 1872, that of Thiersch in 1875, or again the various articles of v. Nussbaum. Immediately after the first publication by Lister, Thiersch had begun to use the method as he understood it, and he continued its use at Leipzig, with varying results, though the best of them were admittedly not as good as those reported by Lister. Other German surgeons also took up the antiseptic treatment early and eagerly, and for a time there was great enthusiasm. By the middle of 1871 this had much diminished, and there was even considerable opposition or actual enmity. The difficulty was that the method was not really understood, not even by many who had gone to see Lister at work. Then came a change. Surgeons still went in large numbers to Edinburgh to see whether Lister really got the results which he reported, and to learn how he did it and why they could not. Gradually some of them acquired a clear understanding of the procedures to be employed, and went home to practice for the first time the real Listerism. The conditions at Munich are a good illustration. For years v. Nussbaum, although he well knew Lister's success and thought highly of his method, had made no systematic use of the antiseptic treatment; he had, he says, "nur hier und da gelistert." In 1874 he was in despair because of the frightful amount of pyæmia and gangrene (up to 80 per cent.), and determined to give Listerism a critical and thorough trial. His success was immediate and remarkable, and he at once became a most zealous disciple and perhaps the most capable and successful promoter of the doctrine. When Lister visited Germany in the spring of 1875 the acceptance of his teaching was nearly complete and his reception at various universities was most enthusiastic.

In marked contrast to this was the attitude of the surgeons of England and this country. As early as 1869 the methods of Lister were well known in America, and a certain small amount of commendation and acceptance is found in the medical journals, but there was no general adoption of the antiseptic treatment. There was, indeed, much pronounced opposition. In view of what followed it is worth while to rescue this gem from a medical journal of 1872 and add it to Dr. Wrench's narrative, with the explanation that the writer was a Southern surgeon of much experience and was highly praised when he died three years later. Commenting on what he had heard a year or two before in an Eastern medical college, he continues:

> To credulous auditors it would have seemed very fitting that a statue of brass should be erected to Professor Lister, and that to preserve the fitness of things it should be placed in juxtaposition to one of Pandora, and while the latter should be figured with her box in her left hand, containing all the ills which afflict the human flesh, the former should hold in his right hand a vial of carbolic acid, the panacea to all the ills to which flesh has fallen heir. . . . To conclude in the soberest earnestness, though Mr. Lister's convoy, freighted with septic germs and carbolic acid, launched as it was in the shallowest waters, engendered a popular breeze which has landed its author in the chair of clinical surgery in the University of Edinburgh, it requires no prophetic vision to perceive that it needs but a little patience, the waiting a little while longer, to see this argosy of tinsel theories and overvalued goods stranded and wrecked on the shores of professional opinion.

Lister came to the United States in 1876 to attend the International Medical Congress at Philadelphia, but, although he had some devoted followers, his reception seems to have been cool. In the next year or two the antiseptic treatment began to be tried more generally in American hospitals, but, despite the fact that Lister had fully come to his own in England, and London had finally paid him homage, its general adoption here was painfully slow.

It came at last, and with it, or close upon its heels, came the shoots of that doctrine of asepsis which now blooms fresh and full. Already, alas! the appreciation of the fame of Lister begins to wane, and little is done to preserve a very vivid memory of him. Recently your reviewer examined a dozen of the smaller books on surgery in English—such as students sometimes read, if perchance they read anything—and it is surprising to see how completely the very word Listerism has disappeared. A suggestion of it lingers in domestic washes and lotions, and the reader may put a penny in the slot at the next corner and get a piece of "germ-proof listerated pepsin gum," but all sense of the real significance of Lister and his work is going fast. This is perhaps inevitable The achievement of Lister, though it made an epoch, is intangible. Few surgeons are now teaching who really knew the prelisterian conditions from personal observation; soon there will be none, and we cannot expect students to have any deep interest in a state of things which has gone and need not come again. We are in the midst of that beneficent progress in medicine no less than in surgery which, though it go back to Pasteur, really owes everything to Lister, who clearly saw the way and pointed it out to a cold and skeptical generation by walking in it himself; but even Pasteur would be easily forgotten by those who are interested chiefly in practical things, had he not left apparatus and methods to bear his name.

Dr. Wrench devotes relatively little space to the man in private as distinguished from the surgeon and investigator, and here the reader must read somewhat between the lines. The book has a portrait of Lister in his later years and a picture of the house where he was born. There are also illustrations showing the infirmaries at Glasgow and Edinburgh. The book is very well made, and the few typographical errors which have attracted our attention are not serious.

To Everyman's Library Dutton will soon add Hahnemann's "The Organon of the Rational Art of Healing."

Dr. Alexander Smith's "Elementary Inorganic Chemistry," for high-school use, may soon be expected from the press of the Century Company.

Dr. Ora Willis Knight, chemist and geologist and at one time State Assayer of Maine, died last week in Portland. He was born in Bangor, Me., in 1874, and graduated B.S. from the Maine State College. He was the author of "List of Birds of Maine" and "Birds of Maine."

Drama

Dutton will include this autumn in Everyman's Library another instalment of Ibsen's plays—"The Pretenders," "Pillars of Society," and "Rosmersholm."

"English University Drama, 1540-1603," by F. S. Boas, is announced by the Oxford University Press.

We have received from Macmillan two more volumes of the Tudor Shakespeare, "The Tempest," edited by Herbert E. Greene, and "Antony and Cleopatra," edited by George Wyllys Benedict. These except for a volume on "The Facts About Shakespeare," which is in preparation by the general editors, Professors Neilson and Thorndike, bring the series to completion.

A versatile actor is as rare as a black swan in these days. The English actor-manager Cyril Maude, now appearing in Wallack's Theatre, has already clearly demonstrated his right to this title, a fact that invests his engagement with a special interest. Thus far he has acted three parts, widely differing in character and manner, without any betrayal of mannerisms peculiar to his own personal individuality, except an occasional indistinctness of utterance. This, in itself, is a notable feat. As Kit Bingham in "The Second in Command" he proved himself a comedian of refinement and intelligence, with pleasant veins of humor and sentiment; in "The Ghost of Jerry Bundler" he evinced a capacity for melodramatic passion, and in "Beauty and the Barge" he furnished an admirable example of realistic burlesque. "The Ghost of Jerry Bundler," by W. W. Jacobs and Charles Rock, is an ingenious little "shocker." He plays the part of a commercial traveller, who makes a bet that he will terrify his companions by impersonating a ghost in whose existence they disbelieve. Leaving them, as they suppose, to perfect his preparations, he suddenly breaks in upon them, in an apparent condition of shrieking hysterical terror, declaring that he has unexpectedly encountered the apparition itself. Having made them all sufficiently nervous, he permits himself to be pacified and bids them "good night," only to return speedily in the guise of the ghost. He frightens them so effectually that one of them shoots and kills him. The piece is worthy of the Grand Guignol. In his counterfeit terror Mr. Maude exhibited a striking command of theatrical resource and physical power, and indisputably stirred his audience, but did not quite convey the thrill of veracity. The elaboration of the symptoms was excessive. His agitation was palpably more muscular than emotional, and afforded no conclusive proof of his ability to interpret real passion with genuine eloquence.

As the affable and amatory Captain Barley in the "Beauty and the Barge" of W. W. Jacobs and L. N. Parker, Mr. Maude presented a complete metamorphosis from the spruce young bagman. The piece itself reflects very little credit upon either of its authors, being constructed on the purely conventional lines of the nautical farce and melodrama dating from the period of Dibdin and Marryatt. Its story is absurd and its dialogue of the cheapest. But to Barley there clings a faint odor of truth. There is nothing of the bargee about him. His dominating attribute of affability alone would exclude him from that class. He can be associated with the type of ancient shellbacks, boatmen, or loafers, all inveterate liars, who infest British watering places. Mr. Maude knows the breed—Nat Goodwin, who tried the part here years ago and tried to idealize it, failed miserably—and embodies this variation of it delightfully, softening its asperities and gracing it with cleanliness and vivacity. Although his impersonation is touched by the spirit of burlesque, it is perfectly consistent, and true enough in many of its details to be human. His exact status as an actor is still uncertain, but he is an accomplished artist.

There is some good and much inferior work in "The Strange Woman" of W. Hurlbut, at the Lyceum Theatre. The play is based upon a useful dramatic idea, the contrast of old and new thought and of cosmopolitan and rural manners, but the construction is slipshod, and much of the characterization is conventional and extravagant. The first two acts are virtually a manifesto against official marriage regulations of any kind. The heroine, an American who has lived in Europe since childhood, married a brute. Having left him, she attributes her sufferings to the ceremony which enslaved her, and determines never to marry again. When she meets her ideal, a gifted young artist from Iowa, she agrees to be his mate, but only on condition that their union shall be one of mutual agreement, free from all legal contract. Naturally, her arrival in Iowa, with these views, which she promulgates boldly, creates a lively local disturbance. But her married critics are so open to attack that she is able to discomfit them utterly. She triumphs all along the line, but she is so affected by the unselfish devotion of her lover's mother that she resolves to sacrifice all her own feelings rather than wound the old lady's, and so elects to conform to custom and be married in the usual way. The conclusion is sane, but is by no means a logical or convincing result of the premises. But the character of Inez is well conceived and drawn and is enacted with so much cleverness, distinction, and force by Elsie Ferguson that the play is likely to prosper in spite of its defects.

The idea of a repertory theatre for London, producing only the best plays by the greatest authors, living and dead, and charging the sum of fourpence for every seat in the house, was outlined recently in a lecture by Miss Rosina Filippi. The scheme, she said, has met with unqualified success in Italy, and if it works in London she proposes to extend it to all the larger towns in England. Describing the theatre now in existence in Milan, where it was founded by "Umano," the friend of the Italian poor, she said it contained 2,300 seats, all cushioned, comfortable, and possessing an uninterrupted view of a huge stage, and all priced at fourpence each. The theatre was constructed out of a dilapidated drill-hall. Plays by Alexandre Dumas, D'Annunzio, Macterlinck, Pinero, J. M. Barrie, the Greek dramatists, Goldoni, Sheridan, Shakespeare, and Molière, had been produced.

The Rose Bearer. By Richard Strauss. New York: Chappell & Co.

In no other department of music has there been so great a change within the last quarter of a century as in the field of vocal entertainment. Before 1890 there were few song recitals. It took the supreme art and popularity of Lilli Lehmann, Sembrich, Nordica, Schumann-Heink, and others to convince the public that lyric songs may sound as well in a concert hall as in a drawing room. To-day everybody who has a few hundred dollars to pay for a hall gives recitals, and while most of these are unprofitable to the singers, they help to make the public acquainted with a multitude of lieder. So large is the number of these songs, of the past and present, that there is a great and growing need of guidance for those who desire the best; and it is from this point of view, particularly, that we must welcome the Musicians' Library of the Oliver Ditson Company, which now includes sixty-eight volumes, twenty-eight of which contain the songs of Schubert, Schumann, Franz, Brahms, Grieg, Liszt, Wolf, Tchaikovsky, and other masters, judiciously selected and edited by competent specialists. The Musicians' Library might be called an aid to the survival of the fittest, and it is encouraging to know that more than 200,000 copies of the song and piano volumes have been sold.

The latest addition is a collection including forty songs of the 160 or so composed by Adolf Jensen, selected by the late William Foster Apthorp, and prefaced by a biographical and critical sketch from his pen. There are some "advanced" amateurs and professionals who look on the songs of Jensen as antiquated; but genuine melodies never become stale, and in his songs there are many such melodies, which when well sung at a recital are almost sure to be redemanded. Hans von Bülow, who had a great admiration for Jensen's pianoforte pieces, placed the songs above them. He admired in these, among other things, the orchestral richness of the pianoforte accompaniment and Jensen's thoroughly idiomatic writing for the voice; and he looked on him as the heir of Schumann, which opinion is shared by Dr. Riemann. Mr. Apthorp admired in his songs "great elegance, charm, and spontaneity of melody, harmonic subtlety, warmth of emotional expression, and southern richness of coloring. . . . If there is one word which describes his habitual vein better than another, that word is 'luscious.'" It was his lusciousness which endeared his songs to the public, but at the same time estranged the academicians: "His peculiar sensuous tenderness, his love for the more languid chromatics, must have seemed weak and unworthy to those old Popes and Pagans. If there is one thing your dry-asdust abhors more than another, it is lusciousness!"

Perhaps the most luscious of all Jensen's songs is the "Press Thy Cheek Against My Own." Mr. Apthorp once censured the editor of a volume of fifty mastersongs for including this one; now his own volume begins with it. On the whole his selections are judicious, yet one regrets the absence of several gems, notably "My Heart's in the Highlands" and "Row Gently Here, My Gondolier." The sympathetic sketch of Jensen's pathetic life given by the editor will interest those singers who use their brains as well as their vocal cords, and will add zest to their interpretations.

For a striking and instructive contrast to Jensen's songs, with their frank, broad melody, one may turn to the songs of Debussy, twelve of the best of which Mr. Manney has united in a volume. Debussy's songs are now in fashion. How long they will remain so, it is difficult to predict. While banishing melody from his opera, this composer graciously admitted that it is permissible in songs; but in his own songs it is not the most interesting element. The opinion is gaining ground that his best compositions are those for piano; and in his songs, too, one finds the chief allurements in the harmonic subtleties and the rhythmic peculiarities of the piano part. The present collection begins with the most popular of his songs, "The Mandolin," and includes other favorites.

The "Folk Songs of Eastern Europe" form a still greater contrast to Debussy's than Jensen's do, for they are all melody, with only the simplest accompaniment, which any one can play. There are fifty of them, representing fourteen nations, among them the Russian, Polish, Hungarian, Finnish, Croatian, Bohemian, all of them famous for the beauty of their wild flowers of song, which fame this collection justifies.

The most popular of Richard Strauss's operas, "The Rose-Bearer," is to be produced this season at the Metropolitan Opera House. It owes its popularity largely to its waltzes, with which this composer entered into competition with Johann Strauss. Of these waltzes one can get a good idea by playing the vocal score, a beautifully printed volume of 451 pages, in which an effort seems to have been made throughout to avoid too great complexity. For the further study of this comic opera, before or after its production, there is also a guide to the music by Alfred Schattmann, translated into English by Alfred Kalisch (New York: G. Schirmer), a book of no less than 88 pages, analyzing the score in considerable detail, with a presentation of all the musical themes—most of them amazingly inane—in musical type. A story of the worth of these themes as fully elaborated must be deferred till after the production of the opera.

Putnams will have ready this month "Latin Songs, Ancient, Mediæval, and Modern, with Music," by Calvin S. Brown.

The Oxford University Press has in preparation "Music of Hindostan," by A. H. Fox-Strangways.

At the Metropolitan Opera House Richard Strauss's much-talked-of opera, "Der Rosenkavalier," is scheduled for the early part of December, to be followed during the Christmas holidays by "L'Amore dei tre Re," a musical setting of Sem Benelli's poetic drama by a young Italian composer, Italo Montemezzi. The revival of "Carmen," long missed from the répertoire, will come after New Year's day. After "Carmen" will come Victor Herbert's one-act opera in English, "Madeleine," and later, in February, the first production outside of France of "Julien," the new opera by Gustave Charpentier, the composer of "Louise," who will come to America to assist at the rehearsals and be present at the New York première. Towards the end of the season Wolf-Ferrari's "L'Amore Medico" will be given, and a revival of Verdi's "Falstaff," which Mr. Toscanini has been conducting with success in Italy. Besides the settings necessary for the novelties, new scenery has been provided for the entire "Ring" and for the operas revived.

When Gounod's "Faust" was first produced, the European critics did not like it, and a New York journalist declared there was only one melody in the whole opera. The London critics went to Paris and wrote scoffing accounts of it to their papers. There was one conspicuous exception—H. Chorley. He recognized its possibilities, but the managers and publishers were guided by the adverse verdict of the others. Finally Chorley persuaded Tom Chappell to venture as much as forty pounds on the opera. He bought the English rights and made a fortune. As for Chorley, he made for the opera, when first produced in London, an English version, which has been in use at Covent Garden for half a century.

It is now to be replaced by a new one, made by Alfred Kalisch.

Excerpts from Lilli Lehmann's autobiography, to which she has given the significant title, "My Way," have already appeared in some of the leading Continental papers, and tell of that most interesting period in her life, the Bayreuth days of 1875 and 1876, of her intercourse with Wagner, and of much that occurred there when the "Nibelungen Ring" was studied and first given. An English translation is in preparation, and will follow the original before long.

Art

A NOTE ON LITHOGRAPHY.

LONDON, November 5.

From year to year I have noted the progress of the Senefelder Club, which is devoted to the advancement of artistic lithography, because its endeavor to reëstablish an art that had fallen on evil days is, I think, one of the most interesting experiments made of late by artists. It is useless to point out the beauty of the art and its wide scope, useless to repeat the history of its invention, its triumphs, its commercial degradation, the efforts to revive it at the time of its hundredth anniversary, the failure that followed, and the indifference that prevailed until five years ago, when a small group of artists working in London formed this organization.

The indifference, the ignorance, against which the Club had to contend at the start were all but hopeless. Print dealers, save the intelligent few, fought shy of lithographs; collectors, again with the rare exception, despised them. The size of the lithograph was one of the crimes charged against it, though lithographers might protest that many etchings, Piranesi's, for instance, are often as large, and that many artists, notably Whistler, worked on stones as small as their copper plates. Then, the offence was in the number of prints that can be pulled from a stone, the collector prizing a print for its rarity rather than for any artistic value, and he refused to see that a lithographer can limit his edition of a print as well as an etcher, destroy the stone when it has yielded the number of prints required, and show a proof from the destroyed stone if his word is not sufficient guarantee—the members of the Club restrict their editions to fifty. Even the average artist shared the general prejudice, and it is not so long since the Royal Academy, which of old had included the distinguished lithographer Lane among its members, rejected a lithograph on the ground that no mechanical reproduction could be allowed on the Academy walls, now reserved for the real steel engraving and popular etching. When artists display such ignorance of what a lithograph is, it is not so surprising that our wise customs officials should once have refused to deliver the work of the Senefelder Club to an American gallery, because the prints were described as lithographs and were not lithographs: the customs officials' idea of a lithograph being no doubt the flaming circus poster and the canned-goods label.

But the last five years have made a difference. The dealer not only consents to look at lithographs, but hangs them on his walls, the collector finds a place for them in his printfolios. All sorts of straws show which way the lithographic wind is blowing—the number of artists who now practice the art, the appointment of a special "Printer to the Club," the interest in lithography of the two or three London critics who count and the consequent falling in line of the others who have no mind of their own, the more frequent use of lithographs in illustrated books and periodicals, the prices brought by lithographs in the saleroom. An excellent test was the dispersal of the late T. R. Way's collections, when at Sotheby's not only the Whistlers, but the lithographs by other artists, were in greater demand than ever before. Lithography, it is evident, is in the air. And, with their success, the members of the Senefelder Club have by no means slackened in their efforts. Their fifth exhibition, which has just opened, finds them in the gallery of Goupil & Co., the largest and most spacious in which they have as yet exhibited; showing the strongest work they have yet done; enjoying the official recognition of such honorary members as Léonce Bénédite, conservateur of the Luxembourg; Campbell Dodgson, keeper of the Print Room at the British Museum; E. F. Strange, keeper of the Department of Illustration and Engraving at South Kensington; A. J. Parsons, chief of the Department of Prints at the Library of Congress; Dr. Hans W. Singer, assistant keeper of the Royal Print Room at the Dresden Gallery; Commendatore Ugo Ojetti, of the Superior Council for Art in Italy. The Club has attracted to itself a long list of lay members, who are to receive each year a signed proof specially drawn by a member, and this first year the edition of the first lithograph issued for the purpose—The New Bay of Baiæ, by the president of the Club—was exhausted before the exhibition opened; and J. McLure Hamilton is preparing the second. Because it is another sign of the way things are going with lithography, I may add that, while there are only eighteen members, already the lay members number eighty.

All this success would count for little if the quality of the work done by members did not continue to justify it. But it does. Year by year the members seem to get a firmer grasp of their medium, to express themselves more eloquently in it, to understand better what it can and cannot do. And it can do a great deal. It is sometimes objected, by those who do not know, that the technical possibilities of the lithograph are as limited as its printing possibilities are unlimited. The collection now on the walls exposes triumphantly the folly of such an objection. The variety which the stone is capable of yielding to the artist who has mastered it is shown in the contrast between the large and broadly treated prints by Brangwyn and Spencer Pryse at one extreme, and the small studies like pencil sketches by Harry Becker at the other; between the depth of the blacks in John Copley's series and the pale silvery tone in the grays of Daniel Wehrschmidt; between the mere suggestion of color in Anthony Barker's and the elaborate color scheme in the late T. R. Way's; between the brilliant notes of a pose, a movement, a flow of drapery by McLure Hamilton and the impressions of the Temples of Greece by Joseph Pennell, who is just now exhibiting a more complete series of the same subject at the Fitzwilliam Museum, Cambridge, several of which have been purchased for the British School at Athens. The fact is, the charm of lithography to the artist is that it will give him almost anything he desires, allowing him a freedom not to be had from the etcher's needle or the engraver's burin. A promise of still greater freedom to come is in Pennell's further exhibit of an original drawing on lithographic paper, together with the zinc plate to which it has been transferred, and a proof from the zinc pulled on a copper-plate press. The artist who prints his own lithographs does not need to be told how great is his gain if he can use a metal plate instead of a stone and pull his proofs on his own etching press.

It is curious that in all their experiments, even the most startling, these modern lithographers are only carrying out the methods and ideas of Senefelder, who left nothing for his disciples to discover. It is creditable to them that they do not forget their indebtedness, this year printing as a note to their catalogue quotations from Senefelder's book, with an acknowledgment of him as their guide and of their own ambition to fulfil his wish that his invention would find many friends and produce many excellent lithographers. "May God grant my wish!" is Senefelder's prayer at the end of one of the most interesting passages in one of the most interesting autobiographies ever written.

Putnams publish this week "Animal Sculpture: Suggestions for Greater Realism in Modelling," by Walter Winans.

Charles Hitchcock Sherrill, whose books on stained glass in France and England have won popularity, now presents "A Stained Glass Tour in Italy" (Lane). Italy is not a glass country, but, as Mr. Sherrill points out, it makes up in variety and quality for what it lacks in quantity. Assisi, Florence, and Arezzo must be seriously reckoned with even by those who know their France. A beautiful form of window, the round without tracery (occhio), is peculiar to Italy. The best examples are of the first half of the fifteenth century with such designers as Uccello and Ghiberti. Mr. Sherrill is a competent and agreeable cicerone, but possibly too intent on the main issue. It would, for example, do the tourist no harm to know that the chapel at the end of the North Transept of Santa Maria Novella is the Orcagna chapel, and under Strozzi patronage. The book is easy to read and contains thirty-three illustrations.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS ON THE CURRENCY BILL.

[The purpose of the subjoined article is not to argue in favor of any one system or plan of the Banking and Currency bill against another, but to give a clear idea of the House plan—why it took its present form, whether it would accomplish the necessary reforms, and how the proposed new note-issue currency would work. The questions and answers are based on a number of actual inquiries received from readers, dealing with all aspects of the pending bill.]

Query.—Why should the present national banking system be changed?

Answer.—Because the present system creates no organism whereby a centralized cash reserve and credit power can exist, to be utilized by individual banks in an emergency. Because the note-issue machinery, being dependent on the supply of United States bonds required as security for such notes, cannot expand and contract according to the requirements of trade for a larger or a smaller hand-to-hand circulating medium. The system is therefore unsatisfactory in dealing with fluctuating trade conditions, and gravely inadequate in a financial panic.

Q.—Did our present system cause the panic of 1907?

A.—It certainly did not; but it left the country's banking organism, when the panic had actually broken out, without the protection which the central banks of Europe give. Hence the peculiar phenomena of 1907—the "scramble of banks for reserve money," the suspension of cash payments, the inability of employers to get currency for their weekly pay-rolls, and the premium on currency.

Q.—What would a new system undertake to offer?

A.—Opportunity for an individual bank to borrow from a central institution, on the security of commercial paper already held as security for its own loans to its customers; thus releasing some of the bank's resources for other purposes. A note-issue system whereby individual banks might obtain from the same central institution, on proper security, notes to pay out when their customers wished to withdraw their deposits in that form, such notes to be redeemed automatically when the customers no longer had use for them. Protection of all subsidiary banks by a strong central institution in a financial emergency—by taking over their sound commercial paper, in exchange for increased reserve money or for circulating notes.

Q.—What is the theoretically ideal system for such purposes?

A.—A single central bank.

Q.—Why is not that system now proposed by Congress?

A.—Because a single central bank, with branches, would necessarily be either under majority control of the banking interest (which public opinion strongly opposes, because of the resultant extreme centralization of power in private hands), or under majority control of political appointees (which would give political power and patronage, and would open possibilities of unfit appointments under political pressure, such as public opinion considers dangerous).

Q.—Why is the plan proposed, in the pending House bill, of several central banks, each serving a specified district of the country?

A.—On the ground that it would escape the dangers just referred to.

Q.—How would it escape them?

A.—By giving to each regional bank, under a board of directors controlled by banks in the district, the independent management of the business of a central bank in that district, but leaving the national supervision in the hands of the Government.

Q.—Would the plan meet the requirements desired for a new system?

A.—It would establish machinery whereby individual banks could rediscount their commercial paper; whereby the note issue could expand and contract along with the needs of trade, and whereby the banks in the district could resort to the regional central bank for support in a financial crisis.

Q.—Does the bill provide the right number of regional central banks?

A.—It is very generally admitted that twelve of them, as provided in the House bill, would be too many, because some of the districts would be relatively so inferior in financial resources to the others as to place them at a perpetual disadvantage and to prevent the regional bank from acquiring the strength which it should have.

Q.—Why does the bill provide for a national board, with supervisory authority over all the regional banks?

A.—First, because, as in the present national bank system, national supervision over the details of the note-issue system is essential; secondly, because there are occasions in which a national emergency might require some national authority to insure that the regional banks should act in harmony.

Q.—Why is this board to be made up, as the bill now stands, of political appointees?

A.—On the ground that governmental supervision could not properly be conducted by appointees of the interests which were to be supervised.

Q.—Would the proposed national board manage the banking business of the country?

A.—It would not; in all matters of banking policy the regional bank directorates act independently, subject to the above supervisory authority on exceptional occasions. Over the ordinary business of an individual bank, the national board has no control at all.

Q.—Are the powers conferred on this national board too large?

A.—The best critics hold that the powers conferred are necessary, but that their exercise ought to be restricted, at least by insuring that qualified representatives of the banking and business interests should have official right to participate in the discussion of policies by the national board. There are two suggestions for insuring this—giving to the banks a minority representation on the board itself, or giving to the advisory committee chosen by the banks, already provided for in the bill, the right to sit with the national board at all its meetings.

Q.—Does the Government issue the notes?

A.—It prints them, and delivers them to a regional bank which applies for them, which pledges an equal amount of high-grade commercial paper, and which establishes a 33 1-3 per cent. reserve in lawful money against them. The Government cannot of itself put into circulation a single note, and it can deliver none to the banks except when a regional bank applies for them.

Q.—Is it true that the notes would be fiat money?

A.—Not unless a new definition of fiat money is contrived. A Government creates fiat money when it pays its own bills in notes, which it forces its creditors to accept by declaring that the notes are lawful money. Under the pending bill, the Government would neither pay its bills by issuing the proposed new notes, nor force anybody to accept the notes, nor declare them to be "lawful money."

Q.—But are they not Government paper money?

A.—Not more so than the present national banknotes, which are printed by the Government, issued by it to banks applying for them (on deposit of Government bonds and maintenance of a 5 per cent. redemption fund), and redeemed by it.

Q.—Why, then, does the House bill describe the notes as "obligations of the United States," and why does it refer to them as issued by the Government "for the purpose of making advances to Federal reserve banks"?

A.—The first declaration amounts to a Government guarantee of the redemption of the notes. The second is nonsense, and was presumably inserted in the bill by the Bryan faction, who wished to persuade their friends that the Government was somehow using money of its own, and lending it to the regional banks; which is not in the least the case. This foolish assertion ought to be stricken out.

Q.—Ought the Government to guarantee the notes?

A.—It is a dangerous practice in its implications, and the experience with our present national banknote system proves it to be wholly unnecessary. The reasons why no popular distrust has ever attached to the present banknotes are that the notes are always redeemed by the Treasury out of the redemption fund provided by issuing banks; that the notes are prepared by the Government, are marked "national currency, United States of America," are countersigned by the United States Treasurer and the Register of the Treasury, and are known to be abundantly secured by United States bonds pledged with the Government.

Q.—Should not the notes be made redeemable in gold, and not in "lawful money," and should not the redemption reserve be kept in gold alone?

A.—There are good reasons for stipulating gold alone. Nevertheless, the present national bank circulation is and always has been redeemable, under the law, merely in lawful money, and not in gold alone.

Q.—Would there be any danger of inflation of the currency, under the House bill's provisions?

A.—That would depend on three things: The desire of individual banks to get notes instead of book credits or reserve money, in utilizing their balances with the regional banks. The ability or willingness of such banks to give up their own reserve money in order to establish the 33 1-3 per cent. reserve against the notes, when the required ratio of reserve against deposits is much smaller. The extent to which the notes would go to the Treasury or the regional bank for redemption, when no longer needed in circulation.

Q.—Would they be promptly redeemed, under the present provisions of the bill, or would they go into permanent general circulation?

A.—An individual bank, with which such notes were deposited by customers, would naturally redeem them quickly, because it can get reserve money by presenting them, and can thereby work more freely in the loan market. The proposed new notes cannot, under the bill, be used for bank reserves. Also, a regional central bank which receives the notes of another district, is required by the law to present them for redemption, under penalty of a 10 per cent. tax if it pays them out again.

Q.—Ought the bill to be passed in its present form?

A.—It undoubtedly needs amendment in the number of regional banks, in the restrictions on the power of the national board, in its misleading language regarding the Government functions in the note issue. There is also need for more thorough consideration of such matters as the arrangements for subscription to stock of regional banks, the provision for Government bonds now pledged against banknote circulation under the present law, and particular stipulations as to the printing of the notes, so as to guard against counterfeit.

Q.—Is there not a chance of substituting a satisfactory plan for a single central bank?

A.—No such plan has yet been proposed whose provisions regarding control did not encounter weighty objections from unbiassed experts and from the public generally. Congressional opinion is, and has been all along, overwhelmingly against it. The enactment of any banking law on that basis, at the present time, is regarded as a political impossibility.

A Remarkable Work!

A HISTORY OF CHESS

By H. J. R. MURRAY

Royal 8vo, pp. 902, with many illustrations.

Half Morocco ... 14.00 Net

The aim of this work is three-fold; to present as complete a record as is possible of the varieties of chess which exist or have existed in different parts of the world; to investigate the ultimate origin of these games and the circumstances of the invention of chess; and to trace the development of the modern European game from the first appearance of its ancestor, the Indian chaturanga, in the beginning of the seventh century of our era.

Many books have been written upon the history of chess, but none covers exactly the same field as this work.

HOUGHTON MIFFLIN COMPANY'S
GIFT BOOKS of UNUSUAL ATTRACTION

Mont St. Michel and Chartres

By HENRY ADAMS. Introduction by RALPH ADAMS CRAM

This brilliant work is not so much a study of the two great churches mentioned in its title as of the current of mediævalism in France as exemplified and embodied in them. It is written with a beauty and persuasiveness that make it readable for the layman as well as for the architect and scholar. Beautifully illustrated. Boxed. $6.00 net. Carriage 32 cents.

Charles Follen McKim: A Study of His Life and Work

By ALFRED H. GRANGER

This is a sympathetic and brilliant appreciation of the life and work of Charles F. McKim, one of the most interesting and effective men of his age, whose achievements in architecture, through the last quarter of a century, from the Boston Public Library to the great Pennsylvania Station, stand unique and unrivalled. Lavishly illustrated. Boxed. $6.00 net. Carriage 27 cents.

Thomas Jefferson as an Architect

By W. A. LAMBETH and WARREN H. MANNING

This interesting work shows for the first time on documentary evidence the nature and extent of Jefferson's talent as an architect. Beginning with some account of his designing of Monticello, the book then proceeds with the part he played in planning and carrying through that unique piece of American architecture, the buildings of the University of Virginia. Lavishly illustrated from a superb series of photographs and other pictures. Limited to 535 copies, 500 for sale. Boxed. $10.00 net. Postpaid.

The Life of Lyman Trumbull

By HORACE WHITE

James Ford Rhodes says: "You deserve the thanks of all students of history for bringing before them the great Senator in an attractive form and by the use of materials that would not otherwise have come to light. . . . I am struck expressly with your account of the Confiscation Act, of the arbitrary arrests, and your telling the truth in regard to the dismission of Cameron from the Cabinet." Illustrated. $3.00 net. By mail $3.19.

Charles Gordon Ames

Edited by ALICE AMES WINTER

"It is a delightful reminiscence, in which one can trace the influences and processes which made him what he was—a man of radiant faith, a Christian humanist, a practical mystic. It is a book to prize for its sweetness and light, and for the impress of a man who lived the life of the spirit in the service of his fellow-man."—Chicago Record-Herald. With frontispiece. $1.25 net. By mail $1.36.

ON A VARIETY OF TOPICS

THE CONSTITUTION OF MATTER

"THE UNITED STATES AND MEXICO, 1821-1848"

A Complete Account of Our Relations with Mexico to the End of the Mexican War by

GEORGE L. RIVES

Recognized by Leading Reviewers as "a Standard Work" as well as Having a Peculiar Adventitious Interest and Value.

JOHN BASSETT MOORE,
Assistant Secretary of State, says:

"The amplitude of the author's researches in historical sources, manuscript as well as printed, is attested on every page, while his thorough mastery of his subject and the directness and lucidity of his style have enabled him to impart to his narrative a remarkable vividness and charm. The appearance at the present moment of this important, instructive and very enlightening exposition of the relations between the United States and Mexico during the formative and critical period to which it relates is singularly opportune."

THE NEW YORK "SUN":
"Quite indisputably a standard work."

THE "NATION":
". . . a scholarly and readable book."

THE PHILADELPHIA "PUBLIC LEDGER":
"It is so interestingly treated that the work seems all too short."

Mural Painting in America

Explained for the Layman by the First American Authority,

Edwin H. Blashfield

Carefully and Handsomely Illustrated.

The sane and catholic attitude of the writer stands out in these words of his:

"The public is as essential to the creation of art, as is handle to blade; it drives and enforces the purpose of the artist. There is need for the advisory companionship of the layman, the statesman, historian, ethnographer, to insist upon types, to emphasize points in the celebration of wise policy, to show us how and where to illuminate the history of our people."

The Nation

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 27, 1913.

The Week

Mr. Choate's speech at the New York Chamber of Commerce dinner, proving so delightfully as it did to his hearers that age has not withered his wit or dimmed his wisdom, drove home with great force tne duty of giving the President every support in his dealing with the Mexican crisis. Nor was this put forward as a mere banality or bit of blatant jingoism. There was in it nothing of the spirit displayed in the appeal to Congress to "stand behind" Cleveland when there was foolish talk of our going to war with England over Venezuela. The plea now is for peace, and for aid of a President striving to maintain it. Nor was it urged by Mr. Choate merely as a pious hope. He does not, of course, speak in this matter as a partisan, though such praise of Mr. Wilson as he uttered is peculiarly significant coming from a veteran Republican. The reason which he gave is clear and ought to be convincing. Mr. Choate has had experience in diplomacy, and it was doubtless with this in mind that he dwelt upon the chief argument for trusting the President. It is that he knows more about the Mexican affair than anybody else. Information from all sources, much of it official and confidential, has been laid before him, so that his knowledge is certainly wider than that of any of his critics.

It is not necessary to say that we have no sympathy with the idea of an abject deference to the Chief Executive in every matter that comes up. His views on the tariff question, for example, or the reform of banking and currency, are not to be meekly accepted just because they come from him. As regards those subjects, full information is open to all. And every man who knows what he is talking about is entitled to assert his opinion, against that of the President, if need be. But the case is wholly different from a foreign complication so delicate as the Mexican. It is not a question of blind dependence upon another when we ought to be exercising an independent judgment; but merely of suspending judgment on a matter where we do not know enough to reach a sure conclusion, and of confiding hopefully in the President, who has the whole case before him—trusting him, that is, so long as we believe that he is doing his best, is keeping within the law, respecting the rights of other nations, and striving to the utmost of his power to avert war while maintaining the dignity and discharging the international obligations of the country.

We are evidently in for fresh discussions of the Monroe Doctrine. Its supposed bearing on the Mexican complication made them inevitable. And here a strange fact is to be noted. It is that whenever the time seems to have come to make a vigorous application of the Doctrine doubt is expressed of its real meaning, and of the wisdom of enforcing it in the given instance. This looks as if the Monroe Doctrine were a fine thing for political platforms and for orations and essays, but that it has a disconcerting way, in a crisis, of retiring to private life. And of late there have even been audacious voices to dispute its value at any time. Prof. Hiram Bingham, who knows his South America well, has called the Monroe Doctrine an anachronism and a folly; and in the December Century Mr. W. Morgan Shuster elaborately argues that it has become only a disadvantage to the United States. Mr. Shuster, if he could have his way, would abolish it altogether, but suggests, as a feasible alternative, that we "modify" it. But that is just what we have always been doing. Col. Roosevelt is at this moment engaged in modifying it in Argentina and Chili. He has, in fact, modified it to death, so far as those two republics are concerned. For them, he says, it no longer exists. But it must be preserved, he continues, to throw an appearance of legality and Americanism about such acts as his seizure of Panama. All this illustrates the great convenience of keeping the Monroe Doctrine mysterious. It is more "elastic" than any currency ever devised. It means just what we wish it to mean, and is to be applied only when we think it wise.

The presentation which began on Monday before the Interstate Commerce Commission at Washington, of the evidence on which the Eastern railways base their request for an advance in freight rates, is in many respects an event of high economic importance. When the application for higher rates was made in 1910, there was a very general feeling that to permit such increase might be merely to start a vicious circle. With rates increased, it was contended, demand for higher wages by the railways' employees would follow. In the end the shipper and consumer would suffer increased burdens, with the railways no better off than before. But in the meantime, and without the rate increase, the demand for higher wages has been made, has been considered by arbitration boards, and has been granted. In 1912 a 10 per cent. increase was thus awarded the engineers, involving additional annual expenditure of $2,000,000 by the railways; this year, the firemen's wages were raised 10 to 12 per cent., involving $3,000,000, and the wages of trainmen and conductors 7 per cent., involving $6,000,000. The railways do not, however, base their request for higher rates on these arbitrary changes alone. The general level of expenses has increased along with wages. During the three-year period since 1910, the railway brief of Monday sets forth, three of the largest systems—the Pennsylvania, the New York Central, and the Baltimore & Ohio—have invested $423,000,000 additional capital in their properties. The result has been an increase of $109,000,000 in the gross receipts; yet the increase in operating expenses and in taxes for the period has been such that net income of the three systems for the period was actually $8,000,000 less in the fiscal year 1913 than in 1910.

On all hands it is admitted that further large use of capital, to provide facilities for the expanding traffic movement of the country, will be needed in the next few years. The railways agree in this conclusion; but Mr. Willard's not unnatural comment is that, unless the conditions were to be changed, "railroad managers would hardly be expected under the circumstances just stated to continue large capital expenditures for betterments and additions if possible to avoid doing so." Everybody notes a change of public feeling towards the railways. This goes beyond the mere question in hand at present. Irrespective of an increase in rates, we think it clear that a different and better sentiment about the whole place and function of the railways in this country has been slowly forming. Forty or fifty years ago, there was some blind idolizing of railway promoters and managers. They were thought of as patriotically advancing our national development. But there shortly set in, not wholly without justification, an almost equally blind spirit of hostility to everything connected with railways. To-day, however, their case is better understood, and a juster attitude towards them is shown by the public. It is certain that neither Congress nor the people would now demand impossibilities of them, or really, in the long run, countenance any gross injustice to them. This new feeling might easily be changed into the old antagonism by unwise railway policies; but, obviously, it may now be taken advantage of to procure not only a fuller understanding of the entire railway problem, but a just settlement of the difficulties to-day outstanding.

The sharp disagreements in the National Conservation Congress at Washington last week reflect the lack of unanimity among the host of those who now call themselves conservationists. One point of difference is whether the control of certain natural resources should be Federal or State. Another is concerned with the rate of development of these resources: a conservative section in favor of going slowly, with the exercise of the greatest care lest private interests get their hands upon what should be held for the public, while a more radical section desires speedier exploitation. These two points of difference have the appearance of uniting when advocates of State against Federal control are found crying out at the slowness of the national Government in allowing any use to be made of the reserved resources. Just here is the weakness of the case of the advocates of State control. Whatever the merits of their main contention, these are obscured by an apparent willingness on their part to join hands with those who would take risks for the sake of the immediate exploitation of the natural resources in question. They need to make unmistakably clear, first of all, that they stand firmly against misuse of any of these resources. Otherwise, the advocates of Federal control must inevitably gain the support of all earnest conservationists.

It was a wise decision by the Federation of Labor, last week, not to attempt at present the formation of a Labor party in this country. There are certainly enough Richmonds in the field as the case stands. With the Progressives apparently intending to pursue their divisive tactics, and with the Socialists playing for their own hand, it would be little that a national Labor party could expect to accomplish, for some years to come, except to hold the balance of power in certain Congressional districts, or to send a few stray Representatives to Washington. It is possible, too, that the Federation of Labor has found as much warning as encouragement in the example of the Labor party in England. Many signs of discontent with its practical achievements have been observable of recent months. A writer in the November Fortnightly goes so far as to argue its complete failure. This is an extreme view, though some of the weaknesses pointed out in the Labor party's position and acts are undeniable. But even if the English Labor party could be called a complete success, it would not follow that its methods could be copied to advantage under American political conditions.

The movement for a permanent anti-Tammany Democratic organization in New York made a distinct advance, when the temporary committee of the Anti-Tammany Jeffersonian Alliance held a meeting for a definite organization. Among those present were a number of men of the highest standing in the community, and some of the Democrats who took a leading part in the campaign for Mr. Mitchel. It was decided to form a committee of eleven, whose duty it shall be to nominate members of a committee of 250, which is to undertake the actual organization of an anti-Tammany Democracy. Upon the choice of these 250 will depend the success of the movement. There is reason to hope that when the list is made up it will be such as to impress the whole city with its representative character, and to carry great weight through the personal standing and qualities of its members. Never has the time been more favorable for taking away from Tammany its intolerable position of domination, and its claim to be the Democratic party of the greatest city in America. With a permanent organization, through which the honest feeling of hundreds of thousands of Democrats can be expressed, we shall be able to look forward to the destruction of Tammany's malign power in a not distant future.

Dayton, O., is in danger of getting herself misjudged. In trying to link to her destinies first Col. Goethals and then Col. Roosevelt, she is offering a target to the dissolute newspaper paragrapher, who will soon be suggesting that Dayton try the Kaiser, or Bernard Shaw, or Mrs. Pankhurst, or Harry Lauder, or any one of similar high-calibre publicity-power. And yet in the original suggestion of Col. Goethals there was an idea worth considering. Only in a superficial sense would it be a step down for the builder of the Panama Canal to take up with the reconstruction of an inland city of the third class. One can easily imagine how the opportunity exists at Dayton for setting up a scheme of city building and organization that might serve as a model the country over. It would be a source of pride that America should no longer have to go to Düsseldorf or Budapest for inspiration. A model Dayton from the hands of a Goethals would be all the more native because it would arise out of peculiarly native conditions—the devastation of flood or fire with which modern European cities have scarcely to reckon.

The terrible storm on the Great Lakes has already resulted in plans to call governmental attention to the need of increased provision for emergency refuges. The extent of the disaster must give weight to such proposals. Not less than 254 lives, according to the Toronto Mail and Empire, were lost, nine large vessels foundering with their entire crews. In all, eighteen ships, worth $3,000,000, went down, while four more were driven ashore and wrecked. Something more is needed than the infrequent harbors, made—like those at Chicago and Milwaukee—by artificial breakwaters at river mouths, for vessels caught by late autumn gales. There are no sheltered bays. But by taking advantage of coves and islands, it is held that even such engineering work as this year's $3,000,000 loss would go far to cover might provide a number of safe shelters for a time of sudden stress. Upon representation of the Lake Carriers' Association that much of the appalling loss of life and property is preventable, a Government investigation in Canada, with the possibility of a Royal Commission, is already promised. The matter is worth similar study on this side the border.

For any "back to the land" movement the present ought to be an unusually favorable time, owing to the remarkable and world-wide rise in the price of agricultural products. It has gone in very large measure to the farmer, despite defects in the middleman system, and is in great measure due to the failure of supply on the farms to keep pace with the increasing demand of the cities. A special possibility in the direction of remedy, in the case of our own country, is vigorously set forth in an open letter to Bolton Hall, author of "A Little Land and a Living," by William Borsodi, whose letter to the author prompted the writing of that book five years ago, and formed an introduction to it. Mr. Borsodi is impressed by the hundreds of thousands of immigrants who work in our mines and mills, save a thousand or two by the hardest labor and economy, and with it go back to their native land and buy a farm of two or three acres. These men might, with the same money, buy a good-sized farm in this country. He thinks that intelligent effort by "an organization that should have the support of earnest, conscientious men" would result in the settlement on American farms not only of a large part of those who return to Europe to go into farming there, but also of great numbers of those who remain to swell the population of our American cities. The plan seems worthy of attention.

There can no longer be any doubt that the stage has become the great educative force of our day. An advertisement of a new "crime play" contains the following quotations from the "district attorney": "Our National Government spends twenty millions a year to exterminate an animal pest, but not a dollar for preventive measures against the human pest—the criminal." Every night intelligent audiences, hearing this terrible indictment of our much-praised Government, must exclaim: "How true!" and go home wondering why no one has said it before. Why should our prisons not be full when we make haste to vote money for a crusade against the boll weevil, but never dream of spending a cent for schols, parks, or playgrounds? One would suppose that a nation governed by public opinion would think it to its interest, not only to provide means of education for its youth, but to compel them to take a certain amount of advantage of such provision. Yet did any one ever hear of a compulsory education law in the United States of America? No, we let our boys and girls run the streets all day and all night, and then clap them into prison as soon as they break some law. But all this will be remedied now. The stage has come to the rescue.

In view of the long years of effort to open up the game of football and make it really football, it is rather amusing to read the complaints that there were no touchdowns scored in the most important games of the year. It is even hinted that something must now be done to penalize the drop-kickers, who are becoming so dextrous that, in Brickley's case at least, it is unsafe for his adversaries to let him get an inch beyond the centre of the field. Sentimentally, Harvard may have some regrets that the great superiority of her term was not demonstrated on Saturday by a touchdown, but the game from the spectator's point of view lacked nothing. It was interesting, varied, and exciting enough to stir any crowd, however blasé. Those who had not seen the modern game and remembered only the incessant line plunging of ten years ago, with everybody piling up in a heap, found it a revelation. Doubtless, the game can yet be improved, and will be; it is undeniable, however, that the rehabilitation of the kicking game and the introduction of the forward pass have worked wonders. The threat of the latter keeps the lines extended and open even when it is little used.

In the surroundings of the game itself and its conduct, time has produced a better and more sportsmanlike feeling between the rival bodies of undergraduates and the teams themselves. As spectacles, the chief contests are if anything more impressive than ever. But the objections to the game persist; the overemphasis on athletics remains. The Superintendent of West Point, a school very largely concerned with the development of the physique of its students and the bringing out of what are known as the manly qualities, unhesitatingly condemns the game and asks for its abolition. Col. Townsley finds that the injuries which result from the game are serious and are not counterbalanced by any great advantages.

Ex-Commissioner Dean C. Worcester has given out an elaborate statement of the havoc wrought in the Philippines by the announcement of Democratic intentions in regard to the independence of the islands. His words would have a more convincing sound if they were somewhat less smooth and rounded. After depicting in glowing colors the magnificent business prosperity which had obtained up to a year ago, he says:

> This extraordinary commercial development was rudely interrupted by President Wilson's expression of the hope that the boundaries of the United States might soon be contracted, made in his Staunton speech. Real estate values promptly fell 30 per cent.; banks called loans and refused credit to back new enterprises; merchants cancelled orders.

Now, real estate is not much in the habit of "promptly falling 30 per cent.," or any other easily ascertainable amount; and, furthermore, when such a state of business demoralization as is above described does set in, the effects of it have never been known to be swiftly wiped out by a little encouragement in the color of the daily news. Yet Mr. Worcester goes on to say:

> As months passed and no radical practical action was taken by the political party in power, confidence was partially restored and business conditions progressed towards the normal, only to be again upset by the announcement that Filipinos would be given a majority in the upper house of the Legislature and by rumors of sweeping changes among the executive officers of the Government.

If these chameleon-like changes have actually taken place in this brief period, the nature of business in the Philippines must be something quite unique.

THE BANKING BILL AMENDMENTS.

On Saturday the Senate, by its Banking Committee, submitted two reports on the banking and currency bill, thus marking a new and highly important stage in the public consideration of that measure. Both the reports are statesmanlike documents, eminently timely and proper in the case of a statute where avoidance of unwise provisions is so vitally important. The spirit of both conforms to the best traditions of the Senate.

The changes proposed are numerous; they open up, in several cases, a legitimate field of debate. Yet neither the amendments of the six Administration Democrats on the committee, nor the amendments suggested by the five Republicans and Senator Hitchcock, are such as to affect the underlying purpose and principles of the bill, or to throw needless confusion into the discussion of it. On the contrary, we imagine that they will go far towards clearing up obscurities and allaying outside doubts or prejudices.

The Democratic and Republican reports concur in certain points. Both approve the main structure of the House bill. Neither proposes substitution of a single central bank. The Republicans concede theoretical merits to that plan, but in the same breath declare it to be politically impossible, and affirm their faith in the workability of a regional bank plan, properly prescribed. Each report declares its adhesion to the plan for broad governmental supervision, and neither suggests appointees of banks as members of the national board.

While the two reports concur in endorsing the greater part of the pending House bill's provisions, they also agree that in numerous important sections, much to the front of late in public controversy, the House bill needs reconsideration and alteration. Each report falls in line with enlightened outside opinion in declaring that twelve regional banks, as stipulated by the House bill, would be too many; that there is no room on the Federal reserve board for three Government officers, with their hands already full of other work; that the compulsory subscription, by national banks, of 20 per cent. of their capital to a regional bank's stock, would be a needlessly heavy burden on those banks, and that better protection should be granted to the 2 per cent. Government bonds now pledged against circulation. Both agree in adding careful provisions for the printing of the notes; in dealing more equitably with interior banks in the matter of domestic exchange, and in striking out the House bill's eleventh-hour provision, very objectionably drawn, for a savings department.

Thus the two reports stand together on the need of extensive amendment to the bill, and in so doing they dispose of the notion, altogether too prevalent, that the public duty of the Senate consisted merely in ratifying all the House provisions, solely in order to get the law on the statute books in the extra session. Yet their plans for amendment differ in some material particulars, and it is on these differences that thorough Congressional debate will properly converge. The Democratic report would reduce the House bill's twelve regional banks to eight of such institutions, with branches; the Republicans would cut the number down to four. This is fair matter for debate; our own present judgment inclines to the smaller number, though with branches.

The Democrats would remove from the House bill the provision whereby the Secretary of Agriculture and the Controller of the Currency would be members of the Federal supervisory board of seven, but would leave on it the Secretary of the Treasury, all the rest to be named by the President. The Republicans propose eliminating all Government officers, and raising the number of its membership to nine, including the Secretary of the Treasury ex-officio. The Democrats make the official term six years; the Republicans eight. This Republican plan is preferable.

In the matter of subscription to stock of the regional banks, two opposing theories are embodied in the proposed amendments. The Democratic report, on the basis of calculation of actual requirements, reduces the subscription to 6 per cent. of the capital of subscribing banks, any unsubscribed balance to be offered to the public. The Republicans, on the contrary, would require the individual banks to underwrite the stock up to 6 per cent. of their capital, but meantime would offer it to the general public.

The Democratic report would authorize a Federal reserve bank to redeem pro rata, in the new circulating notes, the present outstanding notes of national banks up to $36,000,000 per annum, to cancel them, and to assume on its own account the 2 per cent. Government bonds pledged against them, which the Treasury shall then exchange for one-year renewable 3 per cent. Government obligations. The Republican plan proposes a similar operation, up to 50 per cent. of a reserve bank's capital. This is a practicable opening of discussion on one of the oldest and most troublesome stumbling-blocks of the whole question of American currency reform.

On the controversy as to stipulation of gold alone for the reserve maintained against the notes and for redemption of the notes, both reports propose a change, but the Republicans go further than the Democrats. The Democratic report advises that the notes be made redeemable in gold alone at the Treasury, but in "gold or lawful money" at a Federal reserve bank, whose reserve against the notes may therefore be "gold or lawful money." The Republican report provides for redemption in gold alone, and for gold alone in the reserve—this on the explicit ground that "it is obviously unsafe to provide that one Government obligation may be redeemed with another Government obligation." So long as the notes, though issued under the auspices of regional banks, are declared to be Government obligations, this conclusion seems to us entirely sound. So also, we think, is the raising of the ratio of reserve, by the Republican report, to 45 per cent. of outstanding notes, instead of 33 1-3 per cent. in the House bill and 35 in the Democratic committee report.

We should regard it as in all respects wiser if the clause declaring the notes to be obligations of the United States—which we hold as superfluous as it would have been in the case of the present national bank notes—were to be dropped entirely. As it is, both reports approve it. That both reports should also leave unchanged the absurdly objectionable language, whereby the House bill declares the notes to be issued "for the purpose of making advances to Federal reserve banks, and for no other purpose," is the greatest disappointment of the committee's work. For ourselves, we shall continue to urge the Senate and the House to strike out that clause, which states an economic falsehood, and which can have no other result than to mislead the public.

PROPHETS OF EVIL.

It was the rueful remark of a college professor, famous in his day for habitual pessimism: "Well, after all, the optimists have the best of it in this world." This may have been, in his mind, only an ingenious way of confirming himself in his view that this earth is a vale of gloom: how bad a planet it must be if even such sound and studied opinions of it as his own confessedly were proved so often to be wrong! Plainly, it was no place for a reasonable man; and pessimism was thus made triumphant even when optimism appeared to be so.

This kind of dubious Q. E. D. is, however, rather a cold form of consolation for a public man who frequently sets himself up as a prophet of evil. There is Mr. Balfour, for instance. He has been called a pessimist, though he denies the charge. He did once ask, however: "What would you think of me if I were pleased with everything that is going on in the world?" He is distinctly not pleased with what is going on in England and Ireland just now. His recent speech on the Irish question was steeped in melancholy. Of course, Mr. Balfour is opposed root and branch to all that the Liberals are attempting for Ireland, but he is opposed also to the plans of Sir Edward Carson. To the suggestions of a conference and a compromise he is likewise hostile, although Bonar Law, the Conservative leader, has expressed a willingness to listen to Mr. Asquith's proposals. Whichever way you turn, there is, according to Mr. Balfour, no hope. All the possible courses are "bad." Here is his summing up of the situation:

> I look forward—I do not deny it—I look forward with the most gloomy apprehensions to the future whatever course be taken. I think we have been brought by this Radical statesmanship into a position from which no issue which the wit of man can contrive is without the gravest perils and will not carry with it serious disaster.

It would be an exigent pessimist who could demand anything darker than that. When an English statesman abandons even the standard hope that "we shall somehow flounder through," things have gone pretty far. As against Mr. Balfour, however, the optimists are making play by reproducing former predictions of his of an almost equally unrelieved blackness. The Irish outlook is, indeed, dark and troubled, and the most optimistic cannot at present do much more than hope against hope that in time will come a ray of light. But it is recalled that Mr. Balfour was fully as emphatic and fully as gloomy in his warnings, six or seven years ago, against what the Liberals were proposing to do in granting self-government to the Boers in South Africa. Nothing but disaster and woe could follow that blunder, he solemnly assured Parliament and the country. To cite his direful words then against him to-day does not, it is true, prove that he is entirely wrong about Ireland now; but it is a taking form of retort.

It is obviously a dangerous thing for a public man or a political party to indulge too freely in forecasts of trouble. We have had many instances of it in our recent political history. The most striking, of course, have come from "calamity-howlers" on the subject of the tariff. It would be almost cruel to dig up now such a speech as Senator Smoot made only last May upon the certain disastrous consequences of the Underwood tariff bill. The Utah Senator did not "see red"; he saw black. Everywhere men out of work and starving, both industry and agriculture prostrate, and a wronged and angry people burning with impatience to turn the Democratic party out of power—such was his mournful vision. Any one listening credulously to his grieving prophecies could not but be overcome with special wonder at the absolute calm and general acquiescence with which the country made the transition from the old tariff law to the new.

These are some of the perils that lie in the way of dabbling too often and too unguardedly in prophecies of evil.

"THE SATIRIST OF THE VICTORIANS."

To cultured Americans of the 70's and 80's London Punch meant George Du Maurier. Most of us lacked the special knowledge to relish the admirable political cartoons of Tenniel and Lindley Sambourne. The racy draughtsmanship of Charles Keene was already only a memory, and it was twenty years before his mantle was divided between Phil May and Raven Hill. Du Maurier dominated the interval, and nowhere more completely than in the America which later acclaimed "The Martian," "Peter Ibbetson," and "Trilby." A new biography, by Mr. T. Martin Wood, brings those days vividly before us.

Mr. Wood explains the British vogue of the gentle satirist by his completely representative quality. He seized upon a new topic, the middle-class drawing-room, and drew its epic. The amiable pretences of the new strugglers, their somewhat desperate patronage of the æsthetic movement, their innocent way of blurting out the things one would rather have left unsaid—all this he caught with inimitable kindliness and humor. Detached artist as he was by his origins and ever professed to be, at bottom his standards were theirs. Admiration for the awkward grace of British girlhood and young womanhood, a smiling respect for the sturdy crotchets of dowagerdom, fellowship for the lithe and rather languid young men who wore evening dress so convincingly and knickerbockers most adorably, sympathy even for futile tongue-tied dons, egregiously complacent concerning themselves and one another—this was the note of Du Maurier. Nor in Du Maurier's gallery should the bathetic and scant-witted clergyman be forgotten. It is a world of the perpetual afternoon of the tennis tea or the more stately indoor ceremony, with occasional graver glimpses of the compulsory communion of the dinner hour and its obligatory social sequels.

It was probably the Frenchman in Du Maurier that gave him this perfectly lucid vision of the inevitable social dilemmas of an eminently unsocial race. It is the unstudied and very casual mood of his people that makes them wholly amiable, even when they are in some artless fashion acquiring social estate. The tactics of these lion-hunters are so open that only the fiercest lion would decline to let himself be caught. In much this fashion Mr. Wood sympathetically explains the popularity of Du Maurier among those he so gently ridiculed. Very appropriately the book takes the form of a long essay, containing what little biographical matter could be gleaned from Du Maurier's tranquil career. The decline of his work in the later time is sufficiently indicated. Indeed, one or two of the early illustrations for Cornhill suggest that Du Maurier had capacities not wholly realized in the long and willing servitude to Punch.

Returning to the American vogue of the artist, we need a somewhat different explanation. It was the gracious exoticism of the work that beguiled us all, and yet an exoticism in which we had some remote part. Doubtless, our own eager girls envied just a little those slender Tennysonian maidens of whom nothing was expected save to be maidenly. As for our young men prematurely battling with the cares of business and the responsibility of being agreeable, the negligent irresponsibility of Du Maurier's well-groomed youngsters spoke of kinder conditions, where the show of wit was not exacted and the fear of ridicule was absent. Even the parvenus among us must have longed at times for a social order so nicely stereotyped that the real right thing might be unmistakably known of all men, and industriously imitated with good hope of ultimate success. It is indeed of the essence of the Du Maurier parvenu—and the characteristic which separates him from more tragic American or Continental affinities—that he or she is surely going to arrive. One feels the legitimate force of push plus money, and knows that whatever probationary embarrassments the newcomer may undergo he will in turn requite to some newercomer. A sort of progressive poetic justice underlies all of Du Maurier's satire; his graphic dramas, unlike his novels, always end well.

Du Maurier's people are merely engaged, somewhat ridiculously, in what he deemed essentially a worthy emprise. The intrinsic desirability of a glorified drawing-room, the sensibleness of seeking to improve one's own—this was his fundamental axiom, one might almost say his religion. His triumphs cannot be repeated, for the axiom has been rudely challenged, and the cult of a gently bred society is on the defensive. The new people of Du Maurier brought with their ascent a new crop of destructive ideas to which he was wholly oblivious. While he drew, his way of thinking was already an anachronism. Very significantly he carved his initials on the famous round-table of Punch alongside those of Thackeray, the disciple beside the master. But in being anachronistic, Du Maurier was finely perceptive of his proper task. The business of an illustrator is less with coming ideas than with present face values. These Du Maurier presented with the most winning accuracy. His biographer writes truly:

> Already Du Maurier's art is very precious; the environment of the people he depicted is everywhere being smashed up. Our curiosity is sharpened for everything that remains to reflect those people to us. Our debt to the mirror of Du Maurier's art increases every hour.

ORATORY AND THE PRESS.

Fragmentary accounts have reached this country of the Rede lecture on "Modern Oratory" which Lord Curzon recently delivered at Cambridge University. He gave running estimates of many of the leading orators of the present and the previous generation. Some of his judgments were piquant, and some, as his references to Mr. Redmond and to Lloyd George, a little malicious. The cable told us of the neat way in which the speaker avoided the task of awarding the palm for oratory among all the English contenders whom he passed in review. He said:

> The finest speech in English of the last half-century was delivered at Gettysburg—a speech made by a man who had been a country farmer and a district lawyer, which ranks among the glories and the treasures of mankind. I escape the task of deciding which is the masterpiece of British eloquence by awarding the prize to Abraham Lincoln.

Lord Curzon, however, was upon more debatable ground when he entered into a comparison of the oratory of our day with that of a century ago. He believes that there has been a distinct decline. It is too nice a question to be decided off-hand; and weighty opinion could be cited against Lord Curzon's view. Either way, the reasons which he assigns for the alleged falling off in public eloquence do not seem at all conclusive. His explanation is that high oratory is essentially an aristocratic art. Chatham and Fox and Burke and Pitt "spoke as they lived and dressed and drank—in a grand style." They were "a select few among the governing classes who formed a close caste." And as social and political conditions to-day are vastly different from what they were in "the classic epoch of English oratory" (Lord Curzon means the second half of the eighteenth century), it is natural to expect a great change in the standards and displays of public speaking. This has become vulgarized, in Lord Curzon's opinion. And for it the modern newspaper is largely responsible. "As reporting improves, oratory declines."

This is a hard saying. If the lecturer had said that garbled or misunderstood reports of a great oration must tend to discourage orators, one could have understood him and even sympathized with him. But how the spreading abroad of the words of a public speaker, provided they are accurately printed, can by itself do anything to lower oratory, it is difficult to see. This part of the comparison between our day and Dr. Johnson's is largely a question of degree. In his time there was reporting of Parliamentary speeches. He did it himself. Transcripts of the speeches of Fox and Sheridan were in circulation. How did we get, for example, Burke's address to the electors of Bristol, if it was not taken down or carefully written out? But the moment you grant that a legitimate motive and inspiration of the orator lie in his sense of an appeal to an audience wider than the one immediately before him, you destroy the inference that the broadcasting of his words through the press can injure either his art or his influence. There is, of course, something incommunicable in oratory. Neither types nor any other form of second-hand report can convey the real magic of eloquence. But this was not what Lord Curzon was talking about. He seems to think that the mere process of making oratory widely public degrades it. Others might argue that it furnished a new stimulus to the orator, since it offered him so many more hearers to be persuaded or captivated.

In fact, one of Lord Curzon's own examples could be adduced against his contention. He ranks Lord Rosebery high among present-day speakers, saying that there is some justice in calling him "our only orator." He has almost every gift of nature; and is nearly unique to-day in being able to produce orations that are at the same time literature. Rosebery's recent intimation that he should probably speak no more, Lord Curzon called "an unpardonable threat." Well, how has it been with Lord Rosebery in this matter of reporting his speeches in the press? No man has been more fully reported; and no man has apparently cared more about being reported. The most careful preparations are made, whenever Rosebery speaks in Scotland or a remote part of England, to have a verbatim reproduction of his speech in the London morning newspapers next day. Indeed, a constant manifestation of Rosebery's oratorical temperament is his sensitiveness to external conditions of this sort. His friends have long known this and sometimes have acted upon it to aid him. He was once addressing a great audience, and, for the first five minutes, appeared ill at ease. Then a note was handed up to him, reading: "Your Lordship is being heard perfectly in all parts of the hall." After that, he went on with excellent spirit and effect. Such an orator as that could not be hurt by knowing that he should be heard perfectly in all parts of England.

Oratory may or may not have "declined." It certainly has greatly changed. If it had not, the inference would be that speakers were lacking not only in native eloquence but in common-sense. The old style would often be singularly inept today. But if the highest oratory is not so frequently met with in our time as it once was, the reason must be sought in general causes such as seem to have dried up the greatest poetry and made barren the upper ranges of imaginative literature. The press has sins enough to answer for without being loaded down with those for which it has no direct responsibility.

"RARE" BOOKS.

An ambitious young bibliophile is nearly $85,000 richer as the result of a jury's verdict in the Supreme Court of New York. The case was of a kind now almost classic, involving as it did ten-thousand-dollar Balzacs, promissory notes, the fine art of Wallingford salesmanship, and a customer more rich in goods than in guile. The law of negotiable instruments usually works hard on the victim, since fraud must be very clearly shown to invalidate a note of hand. In the present instance a jury held that fraud was proved, and the youthful disciple of Grolier not only had his outstanding notes cancelled, but was awarded a large sum of money of his own already paid out on his "contract." The jury's decision did not hinge upon the point that the defendant had been charged ludicrously exorbitant prices for his collection of machine-made art books, but upon the specific fact that the booksellers, after guaranteeing their "rare" and "unique" editions, could not resist the temptation to make a couple of hundred additional sets bloom where only half a dozen were supposed to grow. Justice was thus rendered upon a technicality, though a technicality that is broad and sound enough. The presumption is that if the publishers had been content with a modest profit of 2,000 per cent., instead of reaching out for a possible profit of 10,000 per cent., they would have been upheld by the courts.

In marketing Balzacs at prices that are occasionally larger than one would have to pay for a first folio Shakespeare, and in marketing mining stock that occasionally sends its promoters to jail, the methods are strangely similar. In both cases the appeal is usually directed to the widow and the orphan: the elderly widow who has forgotten the ways of the world, and the rich orphan who has not yet learned them. In both instances the highest art of specious salesmanship is brought into play. Selling an extra-illustrated edition of Balzac is not a stroke of business; it is a campaign. The evidence brought forward in the case we have referred to shows how assiduously the youthful would-be rival of J. Pierpont Morgan was courted by agents who traded upon the unsuspecting friendship of a boy. One of his intimate friends was the go-between. On the day when this innocent patron of the arts attained his majority he was fêted at a banquet by his publishers, the cost of which was probably charged up to a little extra hand-tooling on the precious volumes. Balzac was merely the pivot about which this extraordinary campaign was waged. It need not have been Balzac. If the customer at the last moment had expressed a preference for copper stock, the devoted agent would presumably have had no difficulty in supplying him with a de luxe edition of certificates of Red Eye common, guaranteed to pay 300 per cent. annually within two years.

Another parallel between Balzac Extra Illustrated and Copper Deferred may be found in the fact that both are frequently commercial transactions, so far as the purchaser is concerned. The rare books are usually sold not as to book-lovers but as to investors. The widow and the orphan are assured that in a very short time a customer will be found for the extra-illustrated Balzacs at an enormous profit. This is what one may call the rather sordid aspect of such transactions, even as regards the victim of the swindle. He does not always come into court with æsthetically clean hands. To pay a foolish price for the love of a supposedly beautiful thing speaks rather well for the victim. To sink a large sum of money into a ridiculously impossible investment simply argues innocence, without anything of its charm. And yet even here it is dangerous to draw the line too sharply. In every field of connoisseurship the love of art and of a good bit of business have very frequently gone hand in hand. Private picture galleries are an investment as well as a luxury. There can be no doubt that the magnificent prices obtained in the legitimate book-auction rooms are used by the unscrupulous dealers as bait for their victims.

Like many evils, the rare-book fraud is simply an abuse growing out of a condition worthy in itself. The love for beautiful books is a taste of surprisingly wide dissemination. Ten-thousand-dollar Balzacs are only for the chosen few, but there are a great many moderately well-off households in which the extra-illustrated Balzac or Voltaire, selling at several hundred dollars, will be found. Here, too, we must discriminate between the natural love for beautiful books, the desire for a handsome and not too expensive bit of house-furniture, and the stimulating efforts of the book-agent. One must not peer too closely into the complexity of human motive. Money can be disbursed much more foolishly than on classic authors in full morocco. It would be a pity if the interests of the legitimate publisher were injured by the operation of the pirate de luxe.

CHARLES FRANCIS ADAMS AT OXFORD.

OXFORD, November 4.

The University did herself great honor to-day when she enrolled this distinguished American among her graduates. There are several occasions when honorary degrees are conferred—at the Encænia, or Commencement, in June, at one of the many degree days during the term, at special gatherings or congresses, such as the British Association, or at any one of the weekly meetings of Convocation during term. The preliminary procedure is slow, taking four or five weeks. The name is first proposed to the Hebdomadal Council, the next week the case is stated, the following week the voting takes place, and in the next Gazette an announcement is made in the following form under University Agenda:

In a meeting of Convocation, to be followed by a meeting of the Congregation of the University, to be holden on Tuesday, November 4, at Two o'Clock, the following business will be presented to the respective Houses.

T. B. Strong,
Vice-Chancellor.

Delegates' room.
October 28, 1913.

1. CONVOCATION.

1. Honorary Degree.

It will be proposed to confer the Degree of D. Litt., honoris causa, on Charles Francis Adams, LL.D., Harvard, late Lecturer on the History and Institutions of the United States of America.

Oxford University is governed by a democracy of doctors and masters who week by week meet in Convocation and Congregation and pass upon the business prepared by a group of eighteen men, who, with the Vice-Chancellor and proctors, make up the Hebdomadal Council. A degree may be conferred in one of three places, the Divinity School, the most beautiful room in Oxford, dating from the fifteenth century; the Convocation House, or in the famous Sheldonian Theatre. By a piece of good luck there was contentious business to-day, so that Convocation had to meet in the theatre. Robed in a scarlet gown with gray trimming, and wearing a round velvet cap, Mr. Adams was first escorted by the regius professor of history to the Divinity School to await the decision of Convocation. At two o'clock sharp the Vice-Chancellor, Dr. Strong, escorted by the four bedells, entered a fairly well filled theatre, the senior bedell saying: "Intretis in Congregationem Magistri, intretis." Taking his seat, the Vice-Chancellor declares "causa hujus convocationis est," etc., and immediately proceeds to the first business in hand, on this occasion the reading of the proposal to confer the degree; and asking in the old phrase, "Placetne vobis Domini Doctores, placetne vobis Magistri?" Unless the question is doubtful, one rarely hears a "placet" or a "non placet"; and as no objection was raised, the bedells went for the candidate and escorted him to the steps leading to the Vice-Chancellor's seat. It was a glorious day, and the sun, streaming through the windows of Wren's majestic building, lit up a memorable scene, the centre of which was the alert, vigorous-looking old veteran, an historical representative of all that is best in American life, to whom the mother of English universities paid homage.

As the public orator, Mr. Godley, had not returned from Princeton, his deputy, Mr. Powell, Fellow of St. John's College, made the presentation in the following Latin speech, many passages of which called forth hearty applause:

Satis notum esse omnibus opinor, insignissime Vice-Cancellarie, prælectiones de reipublicæ Americanæ institutis jam secundum annum apud nos a viris illustribus haberi. Horum alteri, Carolo Francisco Adams, summum Academicum honorem hodie conlaturi sumus; qui cum de Bello Civili dissereret, dilucide ostendit quibus moribus, quibus viris, res Americana creverit.

Quorum virorum cum tam singulare exemplar oculis nostris proponitur, statim succurrit animo antiqua illa Romæ condicio, cum non tam propter singulos cives quam propter singulas gentes nomen Romanum floreret. Cum enim civis alicujus et avum et proavum principes civitatis esse creatos, cum patrem legationis munus apud aulam Britannicam summa cum laude esse exsecutum cognovimus; cum denique ipsum per totum bellum stipendia equo meritum, summa pericula "Pulcra pro Libertate" ausum, propter virtutem in Monte Meridiano spectatam pro contione laudatum, Romanæ alicujus gentis—Brutorum vel Deciorum—annales evolvere videmur, qui testimonium adhibent "Fortes creari fortibus," et majorem exemplis et imaginibus nepotes ad virtutem accendi.

Tales gentes, tales viros Angliæ Novæ provincia celeberrima procreare solet, simplicitatis, constantiæ, pietatis integerrima sedes ac domicilium, inter quos hic civis illustrissimus semper memorabitur, qui cum miles servis libertatem acerrime vindicavisset, mox rude donatus maximam operam enixe dedit, ut vulnera dilaceratæ reipublicæ coalescerent, neque animi civium memoria cladium recentium exacerbarentur.

Cujus rei insigne testimonium in Prælectionibus dedit, cum non suos, sed par illustre ducum adversorum, maximis laudibus extulerit, Robertum Lee et Thomam Jackson—ὅσπερ λαΐνεον τεῖχος πέλε μαρναμένοισιν. Denique, postquam arma togæ cesserunt, locupletissimus auctor de Americanis rebus habitus, et inter præpositos Academiæ Harvardiensi electus, summa gratia et dignitate apud universam civitatem floret, dum juventutem cohortatur ut fortia facta patrum æmulantes sese patriæ impendere sint parati.

Macte tua virtute, senex; sic itur ad astra.

(Translation)

I think it is well known, Mr. Vice-Chancellor, that for the last few years lectures on American Institutions have been given here by distinguished men, on one of whom, Charles Francis Adams, we are to-day proposing to confer our highest Academical distinction. In his lectures on the Civil War, he showed us clearly what was the character of the men who made America great.

When such a striking example of American character as we see before us to-day is presented to us, we think at once of the old days of Rome, when her greatness lay, not so much in the character of individual citizens as in that of her distinguished families. When we hear of any citizen, that his grandfather and great-grandfather were made Presidents of the United States; that his father filled with high distinction the office of Ambassador to the British Court; that he himself served in the Cavalry throughout the Civil War, and courageously faced great danger "For Fair Liberty's Sake," and received public honor for his valor at South Mountain, we seem to be reading the rolls of some great Roman family like that of the Bruti or the Decii, who prove the truth of the words and the truth of the fact that it is the example or the painting of an ancestor which kindles the fire of valor in the hearts of his descendants.

Characters and men like these have often been bred by New England, the famous and noble home of simplicity, consistency, and of loyal duty. He will always be remembered as one of her most illustrious sons, for his unflinching championship on the field of battle of freedom for the slave, and for his untiring efforts as a private citizen in healing the wounds inflicted by the war, and in removing all bitter feelings of defeat. He gave a remarkable proof of this in his Lectures, by the unstinted praise which he bestowed, not on his own side, but on the illustrious pair of Generals on the opposite side, Robert Lee and Thomas Jackson,

Who was a Stone Wall on the battlefield.

Finally since peace returned, he has been regarded as a sound authority on America, and has been appointed one of the Overseers of the University of Harvard; and he is regarded by his country as one of her most influential men, ever exhorting the younger generation to emulate the brave deeds of their fathers, and to be ready to spend themselves in their country's service.

A blessing on thy manly worth, Sir; this is the path to Heaven.

I present to you Charles Francis Adams, an American citizen, for admission to the Degree of Doctor in Letters, For Merit.

By an interesting coincidence, Mr. Adams's Lectures appeared from the Oxford Press this week. A most unfortunate date was chosen for their delivery—Eights Week, devoted to the boat races, when a Gibbon or a Mommsen would not have drawn good audiences. It is to be hoped that in future the October term may be selected for these lectures on American history. The value of the volume, so it seems to me, is the presentation of the subject, "Transatlantic Historical Solidarity," by an active participant in a great struggle. It is an inspiring volume for young men to read, and I trust the old veterans will rejoice in the splendid tribute which the distinguished lecturer paid to his old foe, Robert E. Lee, for whom he rightly claims admission "among the world's great—one more American Immortal."

WILLIAM OSLER.

THE GENERAL ELECTIONS IN ITALY

ROME, November 13.

Peculiar interest attaches to the recent general elections in Italy, as they are the first to be held under the new electoral law, which has increased the number of voters from about 3,000,000 to more than 8,000,000. Under the old law the suffrage was limited to male citizens above twenty-one years old who could read and write and who paid a certain sum in direct taxes, and to persons who had served in the army, had certain school diplomas, or had held public office. From time to time proposals had been advanced in favor of a wider suffrage, but there was no general demand for such a measure, even on the part of extreme democrats. The only statesman who had always consistently advocated universal suffrage was Sig. Sonnino, who regarded it as the best way of raising the level of public life, especially in the southern provinces; but even he, while in office, had not attempted to carry out his ideas on the subject.

Sig. Luzzatti proposed a moderate extension of the suffrage some years ago, but did not remain long enough in office to carry it through. Sig. Giolitti, who had previously always opposed all measures of the kind, on his third return to the Premiership suddenly presented a bill granting the suffrage to all citizens above twenty-one years of age who could read and write, and to all illiterates above thirty, except certain specified classes of persons, such as criminals, etc. Every one was surprised at this colpo di scena, as there seemed to be no reason for a proposal which was so radical, and which nobody wanted. The Socialists, who in theory were in favor of universal suffrage, and dared not oppose the bill lest they should be charged with inconsistency, secretly dreaded its consequences from the point of view of its effects on their own party; the moderate Liberals openly disapproved of it; the Clericals alone believed that it would increase their strength. It was only the enormous prestige of the Prime Minister that enabled him to pilot the bill safely through the two chambers.

As soon as quasi-universal suffrage had become law, the Chamber of Deputies felt that a general election was imminent. But for a long time the date of the dissolution was kept a dead secret, and members remained on tenterhooks waiting for the Premier's word to put them out of their misery. At last the Chamber was dissolved, and the electoral campaign broke out in full swing. Never before had there been such excitement nor such electoral activity, and every party, every group, every individual, put forth strenuous efforts to win the votes of the electors, both old and new. Yet there were no great principles at stake, no important national problems to be solved; the whole interest of the struggle lay in the effect which the new law would have on the five million new voters, while the cynical added that, for the candidates, the election was of peculiar importance only because now for the first time the elect of the people would receive a salary. The parties in the late Chamber were six in number, viz., the Ministerial Liberals, the Opposition Liberals (these two groups generally spoken of as Constitutionalists), the Radicals, the Republicans, the Socialists, and the Catholics. Each of these parties was subdivided in turn into two or more groups, sometimes in bitter conflict with one another, as in the case of the Reformist (or Moderate) and the Revolutionary Socialists. In the present election a new party has appeared on the scene, the Nationalists, consisting of a group of energetic and enthusiastic young men who stand for a more vigorous foreign policy, the increase of the army and navy, purer internal politics, and war to the knife against the Free Masons, the Socialists, and all who try to derive personal profit from the ignorance and gullibility of the masses, or who exercise illicit pressure on the state for class interests as distinguished from national interests.

A peculiarity of an Italian electoral campaign is the attitude of the Government, which always exercises great influence, especially in the southern constituencies, by means of the prefects or provincial governors. A deputy who has the support of the Ministry in power is in a position to promise his constituents far more than any representative of the opposition parties, and for many years Italy has had what is the ideal of many American Democrats—a solid South, solid, however, for the existing Ministry whichever it may be. The support of the Government is by no means always limited to Constitutionalist candidates. Indeed, in the recent struggle no sharp distinction was commonly maintained between Ministerialists and Anti-Ministerialists, and many elections were contested on other grounds than support of or opposition to Sig. Giolitti. In some cases the battle was fought over the Government's African policy, in others over questions of local administration, in others again personal considerations predominated, while in a large number of constituencies the conflict was between Socialists and non-Socialists, or between Clericals and anti-Clericals. The non-expedit had been officially withdrawn by the Vatican in many constituencies, and in others, Catholics, although they were not explicitly ordered or authorized to vote, felt that they could do so without incurring ecclesiastical displeasure. Count Centiloni, who may be described as the Vatican's electoral agent, obtained from a large number of candidates a written agreement not to support any policy injurious to religious freedom or the interests of religion (the actual text of the declaration is not known), independently of the comparatively small number of professedly Catholic candidates.

For all the 508 constituencies, the total number of candidates was no less than 1,278, viz., 635 Liberals of various shades, 58 Catholics, 5 Nationalists, 137 Radicals, 376 Socialists, 4 Syndicalists, 54 Republicans, and 9 undefined. As the election day drew near, the campaign waxed fast and furious, riots were frequent, especially in the ebullient South, with the result that there were many broken heads and three or four persons were killed. On October 26 only 407 contests were decided; the remaining 101, in which no candidate had obtained more than half of the votes recorded, had to be fought out again at a later date between the two candidates heading the poll. The machinery of the new law proved effective for protecting the secrecy of the vote and preventing certain forms of electoral corruption; but its working is complicated and cumbersome, and will probably have to be greatly amended in the immediate future.

As for the political results of this "leap in the dark," one's first impression is that only the Socialists and the Radicals have succeeded in winning over a large part of the new masses of more ignorant voters. The former have increased their membership from 41 to 78, but by no means all of the new Deputies belong to the revolutionary wing of the party, while the divisions in the Socialist ranks are deep enough to render them less dangerous than appeared at first sight. The Radicals have increased considerably, but their principles are so indefinite and elastic that their gains have but little importance. The Catholic increase has not been as large as was expected, their number having grown only from 21 to 34, but apart from the professedly Catholic group a large number of other Deputies owe their election to the Catholic vote.

The tiny Nationalist group is the only one all of whose candidates—five in number—have been returned. In Rome, the Nationalist, Sig. Medici, a member of a wealthy industrial family, ousted from the first division the outgoing member, Don Leone Caetani, a Constitutionalist supported by Socialists, Radicals, and Republicans, one of the few opponents of the Government's African policy; and Sig. Federzoni, a well-known Nationalist journalist, defeated both the outgoing Socialist member, Sig. Campanozzi, an ex-postal official, dismissed from the service for gross misconduct, and Prince Borghese, a Radical landowner and the hero of the Peking-to-Paris motor race. These two victories have had a more than local significance, placing the Nationalist movement at once on a sound Parliamentary basis.

The Liberals have come off the worst, their numbers having fallen from 332 to 271, and among those elected the opponents of the Cabinet have increased their numbers. The revolt against the Premier's policy has been particularly marked in the South. In the city and province of Naples only three of the candidates supported by the Government have been returned, while in Sicily several Socialists and Opposition Liberals have been elected. In Calabria and Apulia, too, the Opposition has gained strength.

These results seem to indicate clearly that, either in consequence of the widening of the suffrage or from other causes, the era of vague, colorless Liberalism is over, and that only parties who are thoroughly organized and based on definite principles are likely to gain strength. Probably there will be a general overhauling of the Liberal organizations throughout the country, but the only way in which the party can hope to withstand the onslaught of Socialism and Clericalism is by acquiring more character and vitality. Possibly Nationalism, which is the healthiest political movement arisen in Italy in recent times, may supply the necessary impetus, as it alone has something to offer the people instead of the universal panaceas promised by the Socialists for this life or the benefits promised by the Clericals for the next. There is still a great deal of indifference to politics in the masses, and, in fact, under the new law only 15 per cent. of the registered electors actually voted (under the old restricted suffrage the proportion was 65 per cent.), and a more vigorous Liberalism, especially if it follows the lead of the Nationalists in advocating an energetic foreign policy and fighting for purer politics—wherein the Socialists, in spite of their high-flown sentiments, have failed miserably—is likely to win over a considerable number of those who have hitherto abstained from voting. Sig. Giolitti still retains a large majority, but the general impression is that he cannot count on it as implicitly as he could on that of the last Parliament, and that he is no longer able to manipulate elections to the same extent as before. An immediate crisis does not appear likely, but many competent observers believe that the Premier will retire before many months have passed. The difficulty will then be to find a successor capable of taking up the burden, for no other statesman has proved himself the obvious leader.

BERNARD SHAW AND THE LAW.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In your editorial, "The Rule that Proves the Exception" (Nation, October 23), you speak of Bernard Shaw as the "best-known exponent" of that spirit that "is fighting for the one great impossibility, which is that there shall be no rules in life, but only exceptions." This spirit, you go on to say, "does not attack laws, but law; it does not attack definite institutions, but the idea of institutions. It is anti-social; not in the sense that it antagonizes society as at present constituted, but the very idea of social organization."

The discovery that Bernard Shaw is not attacking present laws and institutions, is not antagonizing society as it is now constituted, might be deemed sufficiently remarkable. But it pales into insignificance before the further discovery that he is attacking law and the very idea of institutions and of social organization. By an unconscious stroke of irony, the Nation appears to have arrived at a conception of Shaw identical with the one held by that unconscionable blackguard, Louis Dubedat, in the "Doctor's Dilemma," who, seeking to evade responsibility for his unsocial conduct, protests: "I'm not a criminal. . . . I don't believe in morality. I'm a disciple of Bernard Shaw." Is it possible that the Nation takes Louis for a real Shavian?

For Shaw's serious philosophy of rules and exceptions, we may turn to the preface of "Major Barbara" (the italics are mine):

> The advantage of living in society are proportionate, not to the freedom of the individual from a code, but to the complexity and subtlety of the code he is prepared not only to accept, but to uphold as a matter of such vital importance that a lawbreaker at large is hardly to be tolerated on any plea. Such an attitude becomes impossible when the only men who can make themselves heard and remembered throughout the world spend all their energy in raising our gorge against current law, current morality, current respectability, and legal property. The ordinary man, uneducated in social theory even when he is schooled in Latin verse, cannot be set against all the laws of his country and yet persuaded to regard law in the abstract as vitally necessary to society. Once he is brought to repudiate the laws and institutions he knows, he will repudiate the very conception of law and the very groundwork of institutions, ridiculing human rights, extolling brainless methods as "historical," and tolerating nothing but pure empiricism in conduct, with dynamite as the basis of politics and vivisection as the basis of science. That is hideous, but what is to be done?

And after the declaration that he is "a revolutionary writer, because our laws make law impossible," Shaw proceeds to tell what must be done. All this, I suppose, is part of his attack on law.

You go on in your article to describe Shaw as a man who, because the law does injustice in the exceptional case, antagonizes all law, believing (to follow your exact phrasing) "that to live under the rule instead of among the exceptions is ludicrous, indecent, and unjust." As it happens, Shaw has drawn and condemned this very type of character in "Captain Brassbound's Conversion," putting over against it the judge who makes the opposite, yet like, mistake of supposing that because law is law it cannot do injustice. In fact, a fundamental theme of this play is the very truth to which you declare that Bernard Shaw is blind: "the inexorable truth that life must be made up of law—and exceptions." The degree of Shaw's blindness to this truth may be grasped by listening to three sentences from his note to "Captain Brassbound's Conversion":

> One of the evils of the pretence that our institutions represent abstract principles of justice instead of being mere social scaffolding is that persons of a certain temperament take the pretence seriously, and when the law is on the side of injustice, will not accept the situation and are driven mad by their vain struggle against it. Dickens has drawn the type in his Man from Shropshire in Bleak House. Most public men and all lawyers have been appealed to by victims of this sense of injustice—the most unhelpable of afflictions in a society like ours.

The most unhelpable of afflictions! There you have Shaw's own description of the very philosophy you attribute to him, the philosophy, in legal matters, of "no rules, but only exceptions."

Bernard Shaw never said: The golden rule is that there are no rules. What he said was: "The golden rule is that there are no golden rules." His quarrel is not with rules, but with bad rules on the one hand and with golden rules on the other. It is not with law, but with bad laws on the one hand and with the doctrine of legal infallibility on the other. Not with the idea of institutions, but with bad institutions on the one hand and the doctrine that institutions are unchangeable on the other. Not with social organization as such, but with social codes that are not complex and subtle enough to embody the real desires and opinions of existing society. Laws that cannot be respected, Shaw and every other intelligent person knows, undermine respect for law. Institutions that excite contempt excite contempt for institutions. Hence he is the defender of both law and institutions in thundering endlessly into our ears the truth that better laws and better institutions are possible.

Radical sentiments from present-day writers always smell of anarchism to some noses; whereas the same sentiments culled from authors of some centuries of classical standing become highly respectable. There is not space here for the sly comments of Chaucer on the subject under discussion, for the visions of Sir Thomas More, the inspired ravings of King Lear, or the tremendous sarcasms of Swift. Let me, therefore (in order to prove myself a thoroughly respectable person), conclude with a few lines from an intimate friend of Bernard Shaw's, that well-known snob and standpatter, William Shakespeare:

> We must not make a scarecrow of the law,
> Setting it up to fear the birds of prey,
> And let it keep one shape, till custom make it
> Their perch and not their terror.

To which some one will probably be weak-witted enough to retort that these are Angelo's sentiments and not Shakespeare's.

VOCATIONAL SCHOOLS.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The vocational education, much advocated of late, and temperately appraised by the Nation (July 3), is "working to a logical conclusion" in Los Angeles. So extensive have the "operations of a modern school system" become, that at the opening of the current year the Board of Education found itself one-half million dollars short.

High schools, intermediate schools, and grammar schools, with grammar abolished and vocational training substituted, cover the city. Superintendents dash about town delivering strenuous addresses on industrialism. Classrooms are in a flutter of excitement over the daily prospect of "Aud." calls, where distinguished, self-made men tell children how to become educated without studying.

The Los Angeles schools are an evolution. Year by year they have crowded out culture; first grammar from the grammar schools, then Latin from the Polytechnic High School, then prestige from the one academic High School.

The pupils are noisy, "happy," and empty. The teachers are compelled to take an informal oath to the vocational slogan of loyalty, efficiency, personality, and power. Persons who show formal scholarship in their teaching are levelled, or dismissed with a card saying, "By your own request your relations with the Los Angeles schools are honorably severed." The Teachers' Institute meets at Christmas-tide to talk about social obligation and brotherly love and to sneer at intellectual effort and attainment.

Meanwhile, the products of the vocational movement are coming up to college, as Professor Gayley's "Idols of Education" has shown. They are the victims of professionalism in education. College responsibility is great. In four years or more, despite the presence of departments of education, as Professor Fite has signalized in the Nation of September 7, 1911, students must be cured of twelve years' petting and sent forth equipped (1) with a profession and (2) with a decent sense of values.

CALIFORNIAN ENGLISH.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I take "Cafeteria" (about which your correspondent inquires) to be of Californian growth. It is probably formed on the model of the Italian osteria, an inn or hostelry, and connected with Italian caffettiera, or Spanish cafetera, a coffee-pot. It signifies a lunch room of good standing, capable of seating about 200 guests, where everybody has to help himself. On entering you procure a tray, knife, fork, spoons, and napkin at one counter; whereupon the cooks serve you with whatever dish and beverage you select at another; then a check is handed to you. This is the custom in San Francisco, where such places are in great request. An orchestra performs from a mezzanine during the busy hours.

At Oakland the adjective "encinal" is applied to a line of cars that runs from the jetty along the coast through Alameda. The word is derived from Spanish encina, the live oak (Quercus agrifolia), an evergreen tree which grows abundantly along the foothills and on the coast in this locality; it is, in fact, the species from which the town of Oakland was named; hence "Encinal Line" means the line that skirts the coast. Another word I noticed during my recent visit to California, which is not yet included in the dictionaries, is "renovatory." This denotes a small shop where garments, both male and female, are repaired and cleaned; there are several in different parts of the town.

A COLERIDGE CONCORDANCE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Will you give me space in your correspondence columns to announce my undertaking of a concordance to the complete poetical and dramatic works of Samuel Taylor Coleridge?

The concordance will be compiled co-operatively, as have been Professor Cooper's Wordsworth Concordance and Professor Osgood's Spenser Concordance. With the approval of Mr. Ernest Hartley Coleridge, and the consent of the Oxford University Press and of Mr. William Heinemann, who holds the copyrights on some of the pieces, my concordance will be based on the two-volume Oxford Press text of "The Complete Poetical Works of Samuel Taylor Coleridge," edited by Mr. Ernest Hartley Coleridge in 1912.

I shall be grateful for any suggestions or information that may be offered to me.

THE FAREWELL SPEECH IN "HAMLET."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In "Polonius and the Zeitgeist," published in the Nation for October 30, the writer has no way of accounting for the farewell speech of Polonius to Laertes, except on the "ground that the author had a few gnomic sentences in his head on the subject of success in life, and thought the third scene of the first act of Hamlet as good a place as any." And he calls our attention to the fact that inasmuch as Laertes had already been to France, the situation does not in any way demand such a speech.

I wish simply to say that in view of such a situation, that of a young man's departure, Shakespeare could hardly have avoided this speech. It has been pointed out that there were certain very definite relations between the drama and the fiction of the Elizabethan period. This convention of the "farewell speech" was one of them. By the time that Shakespeare was writing "Hamlet" the convention was too firmly established, and too well recognized, to be disobeyed merely because a particular situation did not happen to make such a speech absolutely imperative.

The convention had its origin in the prodigal son story, a fact which does not in any way controvert a later statement in the article quoted, that there is an element of universality about such a speech as that of Polonius. The prodigal son theme was one of considerable importance in literature at, and before, the time of Shakespeare; particularly this phase of it, which so well suited the didacticism, real and pretended, of the age. The opportunity to give bits of worldly wisdom which the departure of the prodigal son offered was too good to let pass. There was a similar situation which offered as excellent an opportunity, the situation of the death-bed, in which an old man could discourse at length to his sons or daughters upon the philosophy and policies of life. The two situations came to have practical identity so far as the opportunities which they presented were concerned. The advice given and the phraseology used, as can be seen from the works of Gascoigne, Lyly, Greene, Lodge, and others, were stereotype expressions in accordance with a convention.

THE PROGRESSIVE LIFE.

Theodore Roosevelt: An Autobiography. New York: The Macmillan Co. $2.50 net.

"Naturally," says Mr. Roosevelt in his preface, "there are chapters of my autobiography which cannot now be written." It is the simple truth to add that these unwritten chapters must surpass in interest any of those which he has laid before us. For there is almost no raising of the curtain here, no revelation of that "inside history" which makes memoirs at once so fascinating and so valuable. Nevertheless, the Colonel has no apparent difficulty in prolonging his story to the limits of a sizable volume, made somewhat inconvenient, it must be acknowledged, by the use of heavy calendered paper.

The outstanding feature of the book happens to be that which characterizes the autobiography of another public man, who, no more than Mr. Roosevelt, it is to be feared, would relish any comparison between the two men. Senator La Follette's account of his career is hardly to be called a narrative: it is a discourse, strung upon a chronological thread. Now, Mr. Roosevelt can beat any man at that man's own game; and, accordingly, he outpreaches the Wisconsin Senator in both volubility and vociferation. It is La Follette who scores the worst single instance of sermonizing, for he was allowed by his publishers to conclude his volume with thirty-five pages containing his fatal Philadelphia address. But the Colonel does badly enough by printing as part of one of his chapters a four-thousand-word letter to Charles J. Bonaparte which merely rehearses the points he has just been thundering into his reader's ears. Another similarity of the new book to the older one is its terrible earnestness. Both La Follette and Roosevelt have seen things which struck them as amusing, and which they pass on to others, but one looks in vain for a real sense of humor in either. Most volumes of reminiscences are notable for their recounting of anecdotes, but neither of these gentlemen has time or inclination to stop for such petty matters. "John Hay was one of the most delightful of companions," we are told, "one of the most charming of all men of cultivation and action." What a series of stories this statement would introduce in the ordinary autobiography! But Mr. Roosevelt's is not the ordinary autobiography. A nation is waiting to be saved, and only a torrent of words can avert its impending doom.

What Mr. Roosevelt has done is to write an apologia. He takes up his deeds one after another, retells them briefly, and then immerses them in a flood of explanation and justification. Even this method of treatment would give his book importance if the explanation and justification contained new matter, but they do not. There is the same elaborate balancing between extremes, coupled with the free use of superlatives, with which we have long been familiar. This iron necessity of recognizing two sides to everything, of finding some evil in every good and some good in every evil, leads Mr. Roosevelt to ludicrous lengths now and then, as when he qualifies his abhorrence of conditions in Cuba prior to 1898 by the handsome confession that there is much that he sincerely admires about the Spanish character, and that there are few men for whom he has felt greater respect than for certain gentlemen of Spain whom he has known. Even Colombia is not utterly depraved. Its despoiler is "well aware that the Colombian people have many fine traits." But in the case of Panama, of course, it had to be judged "by the action of its Government." Always Mr. Roosevelt's enemies are divided into the wicked and the foolish. In the final chapters, however, in which he is dealing with his policy in foreign affairs, even this love of antithesis does not enable him to do his opponents justice. His description of the men who wish to go faster than he in substituting peace for war is fantastic. Why should even a man with a "temperament" assert of them that "they rarely try to prevent their fellow-countrymen from insulting or wronging the people of other nations"?

But if Mr. Roosevelt is unfair to his opponents, he makes up for it by unstinted praise of his conduct in Cuba and of his seven and a half years in the Presidency. Just as he and those who think as he does are the only ones who can be said to stand for both peace and righteousness, so he and they are compelled to look back with regret upon the changes that ensued after March 4, 1909. Over "my successor" Mr. Roosevelt shakes his head sadly. Yet the most striking omission in the book is of the struggle with that successor in the summer of 1912. There is hardly a word of the events connected with either Chicago Convention.

One chapter does not fall into the category of all the rest. It is entitled Outdors and Indoors. Free not only from partisanship but from didacticism, relating itself closely to life in the Roosevelt household, it is the stuff of which genuine autobiography is made. Instead of proclaiming and reiterating that love of birds and the out-of-doors as well as of books is essential to any sound patriotism, the Colonel is content to let you see his love for these things, and the large part they may play in the life of the most energetic man.

In all its characteristics, its limitations no less than its merits, the volume is the Colonel's own. As autobiography, it is open to criticism. As Mr. Roosevelt's autobiography, the criticism must be tempered with an acknowledgment of its essential fitness.

CURRENT FICTION.

The Dark Flower. By John Galsworthy. New York: Charles Scribner's sons.

The Garden Without Walls. By Coningsby Dawson. New York: Henry Holt & Co.

Mr. Galsworthy has given us an account of the "love-life" of a modern Englishman, to the virtual exclusion of all else about him. Mark Lennan has a right to his temperament by virtue of his profession as an artist. His ambition to be a sculptor is early recorded of him, and we perceive that he presently realizes that ambition. But we know nothing of his art beyond the fact that it distinctly does not lean towards the treatment of sex. And we get no glimpses even of his struggles towards success. The interest of the story is focussed upon the three episodes which mean most in the sexual-emotional experience of the man. Each of them is complete in itself, and the separate parts are entitled, not without precedent, Spring, Summer, and Autumn.

At nineteen Mark Lennan loves and is loved by a woman of thirty-six, the wife of his tutor at Oxford. The husband is a self-centred pedant, and she has never known passionate love till her infatuation for this handsome boy. It is the last appeal of her departing youth for a woman's happiness, and she yields to it desperately. They have come almost to the crisis when a short separation eases the boy's heart of its strain, and reveals to the woman how unnatural and futile is the union she has dreamed of.

The second episode finds Lennan, after six years of study at Rome and Paris, just launched upon his career. Again it is a married woman to whom he is passionately drawn—another victim of formal wedlock, the chattel of a man for whom she has no love. She is of Lennan's own generation, of his own kind; should have been his mate, and at last consents to be, at all cost. She does indeed give herself to him: they are to take up life together on the morrow. But in the hour of their fulfilment vengeance and death snatch her from him, and he is alone once more.

The final episode takes place twenty years later. For fifteen years Lennan has been married, peacefully, to the sweet Victorian maiden who has loved him in youth. He loves her deeply, but his wooing of her has no place in these annals of passion. And at forty-six he wakes to the fact that he still has need of passion, of "l'amour," the spirit of Youth and of Spring. And there comes upon his path, while he is in this mood, a young girl who is the embodiment of that spirit. Circumstance and her own will offer her to his arms; she is for him to take. But history repeats itself: like the partner of his earliest affair, he has his great desire, but "lacks the illness should attend it." His love for his wife triumphs, though tardily, over his passion for one who must, in the end, be his victim.

It is a chronicle which few persons will find agreeable, and many will pronounce morbid. But it has neither mawkishness nor fruitless eroticism.

There is a good deal of clever writing in Mr. Dawson's book. It displays the sensibility, the conscious fancifulness, which mark the work of a considerable group among the younger English story-tellers. Another item at variance with the tradition of John Bull the bluff and forcible: our own young novelists are, if cruder, far more robust. Outside of fiction, also, it is the English writers of the day who are volatile and exuberant, not the American. "The Garden Without Walls" is exhausting. It has a highly excited nervous system. At immense length, and with tearful earnestness, it recounts the feebly erotic experiences of an Englishman of "temperament." He is too good to be bad and too bad to be happy: is forever dallying with the possibility of sexual satisfaction, which he calls sin, but is never man enough to compass it. At the end of all these pages we leave him in worse case than we found him: a person technically sinless, but smirched beyond hope.

The Trail to Yesterday. By Charles Alden Seltzer. New York: Outing Publishing Co.

In romance it is rather unusual to marry off the hero and the heroine at the beginning of the story. There is something to be said for this plan; at least it gets the inevitable promptly out of the way. It is still more unusual for the hero to win the heroine's hand by threatening to shoot the parson on the spot unless she accepts him; but this, too, has the advantages of rousing curiosity and of providing a pretty problem for the novelist. It also gives the hero an interesting handicap; it is rather hard to win the affection of a young lady after you have married her at first sight and at the pistol's point. These elements of novelty the jaded reader will find in "The Trail to Yesterday," but he will find no others. Most of the usual ingredients of Western stories are here—Eastern heroine, unscrupulous Eastern capitalist, Western bad man, straight-shooting Western hero (genus "Virginian"). Mix these with the novel situation just described, and flavor to taste with cattle-stealing, shooting, and rescues, and you have the story, presented in sprightly enough style.

T. Tembarom. By Frances Hodgson Burnett. New York: The Century Co.

Once upon a time there was a small boy who was very poor and had little to eat after his mother died. He was also a wise little fellow, and so he accepted two dimes from a kind neighbor and bought newspapers to sell. His polite manners brought him many customers and friends, and soon he became office-boy in a newspaper office. He worked very hard, and was permitted to run the society page on the Sunday Earth.

One day a lawyer came to see Tem and informed him that a relative had left him an estate in Lancashire, of which he was to take immediate possession. It seemed as nice as a "vaudeville show" to T. T., and he accepted. Only he did not forget his old friends. He provided for some in New York, invited others to visit him in England, proposed to a little girl at the same boarding-house, and when she refused him on account of his new wealth, launched her father into business, and sailed away to conquer the old world.

Obviously, not a problem novel. The story is not concerned with eugenics or family skeletons. Neither does it preach moral doctrine, save perhaps the good old gospel that the good and kind live happily ever after. The book is rather a modern fairy-tale in "American slang," of which we must admit the writer makes excessive and not always dexterous use. Mrs. Burnett has drawn a minute picture of story-book life as it might exist in a twentieth-century New York boarding-house seen through magic glasses. T. Tembarom is a not distant relative to Little Lord Fauntleroy. The story is similar, and there are similar studies of character—the staid English attorney, the conservative lord; Mr. Hobbs, the grocer, is supplanted by Mrs. Bouse, the landlady. T. T. is himself a genial successor to the little lord.

Ring for Nancy. By Ford Madox Hueffer. Indianapolis: The Bobbs-Merrill Co.

This is such pure farce, and depends for its humor on situations so frankly extravagant, that it might well have had a plot of less complexity. Skimming the seas of summer persiflage, it is nevertheless constructed on a three-decker frame. The essential idea is one that has been sadly overused in the last few years: an eligible bachelor trying hard to escape the plots and lures of three designing women, only to rush, in the last chapter, into the arms of a fourth. But the three plotters and marplots each represent some form of worldly vanity to be satirized; the ultimate heroine appears disguised as a maid, though she is really a lady during most of the story; there are two families, but slightly connected with the main action, whose fortunes we must follow, and the hero has a positive genius for mishaps that—though each has its own Pickwickian humor—only hamper our interest as we try to follow the main thread.

In the end, with the bachelor more and more fascinated by the maid, the romantic interest overpowers even the humor, and the reader takes the book seriously enough to rejoice in the happy marriage which caps the action.

Two Little Parisians. By Pierre Mille. New York: John Lane Co.

In his admirable studies of the soul of a child, the gifted French journalist and philosopher resorts to little of that sophisticated innocence which passes so frequently for understanding in our Anglo-Saxon literature of infancy. M. Mille's hero is not the victim of condescension. On the contrary, his elderly friend and biographer concedes to little Caillou an outlook upon life which deserves restatement in grown-up terms and under forms of grown-up logic. After all, the zoölogist who describes a rare specimen of beetle does not attempt to imitate the language of the Coleoptera. Certainly in the case of M. Mille and Caillou the serious employment of scientific observation has not interfered with the delineation of exquisite little pictures of the child's mind.

TEXTUAL CRITICISM OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

The Washington Manuscript of the Four Gospels. By Henry A. Sanders. New York: The Macmillan Co. $2.

The Text and Canon of the New Testament. By Alexander Souter. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. 75 cents net.

Attention should be called at the outset to the completion of Von Soden's "Die Schriften des Neuen Testaments" with the publication of the second and final part containing the text with apparatus. In the first part of this important work, which appeared at intervals between 1902 and 1910 and which is devoted to an elaborate introduction justifying and explaining the text and the selected apparatus of the second part, the author has had at his control more manuscripts, especially minuscules, than any previous editor of the text of the New Testament; has invented a new and ingenious notation for the codices, abolishing the distinction between uncials and cursives, and has worked out a theory of textual criticism which differs from that of Westcott and Hort, particularly in reference to what is commonly called the "Western text." This theory, which has affected the textual opinions of Professor Sanders, maintains that in the fourth century there were in existence three recensions of the text of the New Testament, one made by Lucian at Antioch (K), another by Hesychius in Egypt, of which Jerome speaks (H), and a third made by Origen and published by Pamphilus and Eusebius in Palestine (I). The ancestor of these recensions, it is argued, is the oldest attainable form of the text of the New Testament, the I-H-K text, and was known to all the writers of the third and second centuries. The divergences between this text and the quotations in early fathers are explained away by the assumption that Tatian's Diatessaron was widely used, and that it corrupted all extant texts. The place here assigned to the operation of the text of Tatian manifestly leaves no standing-ground alongside for the "Western text" which plays a leading part in the theory of Westcott and Hort.

In the apparatus of the second part the witnesses are arranged according to recensions and families (except in the case of H), so that one gets at a glance, if one has mastered the notation, the history of the reading as the editor understands it. In a second section of the apparatus are recorded in black type readings worthy of being regarded as original, what Westcott and Hort call "alternative readings"; while in a third distinct section information is given on less important textual matters. It will be seen from this statement of Von Soden's theory, an admirable account of which is furnished by Professor Souter, that the recension of Lucian corresponds to the Syrian text of Westcott and Hort, the Hesychian to their Neutral and Alexandrian (between which Von Soden does not distinguish); but the Palestinian recension has only points of contact with their "Western text."

Turning now directly to Professor Sanders's volume, we may state that it is not simply a collation, but also a study of the text of a manuscript of the gospels, purchased by Mr. Charles L. Freer, of Detroit, in Gizeh in 1906, and eventually to be transferred to the Smithsonian Institution in Washington. The collation, it may be said, is at once clear, complete, and accurate; it may be verified now by reference to the facsimile of the MS. which Professor Sanders has just published in a separate volume. Of the many readings peculiar to W (the notation of Gregory accepted by Sanders; it is α 0 4 in Von Soden) it is tempting to quote the one in Mark iii, 21, where, after the statement that the family of Jesus (his people) went out to lay hold on him, all MSS. but W add: "For they said, he is beside himself." This MS., however, removes the implication that Jesus was thought to be out of his mind, not by omitting the passage quoted, as Matthew and Luke do, but by reading: "For they said they were attached to him."

The most noteworthy reading, however, which was known to Jerome but which has not been found as yet in any Greek MS. except W, is the utterance ascribed to Jesus in one of the spurious endings of Mark (xvi, 9-20), namely, the words inserted between verses 14 and 15. As the passage is probably familiar to recent readers of the daily press, it is unnecessary to quote it. Those who are interested will find an exhaustive study of the saying in Gregory's "Das Freer-Logion," published five years ago.

According to Dr. Sanders, the available evidence points in the main to the fourth century as the date of W, the date, it will be remembered, of the celebrated Vaticanus and Sinaiticus. One quire, however, the first quire of John (I, i—v, 11) is in a different hand and on a different kind of parchment. This quire, the editor thinks, is slightly older than the rest of W; other experts have already taken issue with him in this opinion. The order of the gospels is, as in Codex Bezæ, Matthew, John, Luke, and Mark. Apart from John xiv, 25—xvi, 7, and Mark xv, 13-38, the text is complete and in excellent condition, as the specimen pages given in this volume suggest.

Instead of contenting himself with a collation of the text and palæographical observations, the editor discusses at length the problem of the text. In this study, he assumes, apparently, Von Soden's theory of recensions by Hesychius and Lucian; but in place of the German scholar's Palestinian recension, he postulates with Hoskier the theory of early polyglots, and uses the expression "version tradition" to designate the type of text found in the bilinguals, versions, and Greek MSS. allied to the versions. Bearing in mind this definition and Von Soden's theory, the reader may be interested in a concise summary of Professor Sanders's conclusions about the types of text represented in W: (1.) The text of Matthew, which, apart from traces of Hesychian influence, is the same throughout, is the oldest example of that family of the recension of Lucian which Von Soden denominates K'. (2.) The text of Mark is erratic, like that of Codex Bezæ. Up to v, 30 it is closely related to the Old Latin e, though Coptic and Syriac influences are felt. From v, 31 on, the text is akin to the Old Latin, but not to e; furthermore, in this part there is no perceptible evidence of the influence of the recensions of Hesychius or Lucian. (3.) The text of Luke is Hesychian up to viii, 12; from there on it is Lucian, with traces of "version tradition." (4.) The foreign quire of John (I, i—v, 11) presents a decidedly mixed type of text, while the rest of John is preëminently Hesychian. Passing over the elaborate theory, difficult to summarize fairly, by which Professor Sanders would account for the character of the text of the archetype of W, we may close the notice by congratulating him upon his great achievement as the editor of what is probably one of the three oldest Greek manuscripts of the gospels.

Professor Souter's little volume on the "Text and Canon of the New Testament" is one of the best books in the admirable series entitled "Studies in Theology." The treatment of the text, which is at once trustworthy, readable, and informed, gives the work a place instantly alongside of the excellent manuals of Lake and Kenyon. The description of the formation of the canon, briefer in compass, is supplemented by the addition of thirty or more pages of original sources bearing on the history of the canon. The Greek sources are furnished with an English translation; many readers would have welcomed an expert translation of the Latin sources also. One cannot escape the impression that the author, who is an eminent textual authority, is hampered by the endeavor to do justice in one small volume to both canon and text. The editor of the series should have given a separate volume to each subject. The failure to discuss Hoskier's original theory of polyglots, which, as we have seen, has affected Dr. Sanders's understanding of the Washington manuscript, is undoubtedly due to considerations of space. On the other hand, the reason why Dr. Souter contents himself with a bare mention of W is to be accounted for by the fact that the English edition of his work appeared before Dr. Sanders's volume.

Swinburne: An Estimate. By John Drinkwater. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. $1.50 net.

A passionate, interesting, irritating treatment of Swinburne, involved with a fiery exposition of Mr. Drinkwater's own conception of poetry and the nature of the poetic mind, the central dogma of his æsthetic creed being that "truth, in art, is merely conviction." We shall not quarrel here with Mr. Drinkwater's romantic defence of romantic poetry. Neither shall we linger over the balance sheet on which he sums up Swinburne's defects and qualities. As compared with his recent hotly panegyrical work on William Morris, this estimate is well balanced, is within its limits critical. He concedes, on the one hand: that Swinburne is unique among the great poets of the world in the inflexibility of his manner and style; that he is sometimes intoxicated with the mere "life of words"; that he produces notably few memorable lines; that he wrote a good deal that cannot be justified except as technical exercise; that he overworks the anapæst; that his longer lyrics lack evolution; that he is deficient in the narrative sense; that he does not understand dramatic form and technique; that as a critic he gives way to the passion of the moment. On the other hand, he contends: that Swinburne is a wonderful master of metrics; that he has as much thought as a poet needs, and treats in his twenty volumes a vast range of subjects; that he has a magnificent abundance and intensity of passion; that his prevailing mood and attitude are consistently and bravely "eager"; that, though there is much in him that belongs to imperfection, even to failure, there is more "that places him in the company of poets whose names are among the holy things of the earth."

To most of this—praise as well as detraction—the reviewer is ready to say, "Agreed." But so far as the defects recited above are concerned, who does not agree? And who does not agree, also, that Swinburne was one of the great masters of word-craft and musical sound? The present task of criticism in his case is to establish, if it be possible, his contested merits; more specifically to show that he does possess that intellectual substance and broadly representative character which are rather generally denied him, but without which he cannot maintain his place among the great poets of the age. We have enough, for the time being, of ardent æsthetic criticism in Mr. Drinkwater's manner. What we need now, what Swinburne needs now, is a critic who, undaunted by his vast verbal and emotional incontinence, will patiently study the evolution of his ideas, with steady reference to the contemporary movement of ideas and events on the Continent as well as in England. In such a study the decadent passional note of the too well known "Poems and Ballads" would sink to a subordinate place, and high light would fall upon his flaming patriotism, his republicanism, the cosmopolitanism of his political sympathies, his angry anti-clericalism, his eloquent religious "positivism," his pantheistic conceptions of man and nature. Properly placed in his age and related to the forces which he celebrated, he would not appear as a great thinker; but he would emerge, in the opinion of the reviewer, with unique claims as the greatest poetical representative in England of the world movement known as romantic humanitarianism.

Now for the performance of this service to Swinburne, Mr. Drinkwater's æsthetic creed and his critical method totally disqualify him. Holding that "poetry is poetry" and the evolution of a talent is pseudo-scientific psychology, he declares that "whether or no a poet's art shows a steady growth in power from book to book is a question of but little importance"—which he ignores. Holding, furthermore, that "truth, in art, is merely conviction," he is concerned solely with the intensity of that conviction and the forms it takes. In strict consistency he has no occasion to inquire whether the poet is sane or mad, drunk or sober, physically normal or degenerate. He has no occasion to compare Swinburne's "truth" with the "truth" of his contemporaries, at home or abroad, or to number the multitudes for whom he was spokesman. The temporary or permanent representativeness, the conformity or non-conformity of his sense of truth with the general sense of Englishmen or human traditions, does not properly enter as a question under Mr. Drinkwater's æsthetic creed. The only legitimate question for him is, "Does Swinburne's art veraciously represent Swinburne?"

Mr. Drinkwater holds to this egoistic doctrine with sufficient firmness to warrant him in disregarding Swinburne's intimate and unexplored relations with Continental poetry; holds to it with just sufficient tenacity to explain his indifference to chronology and to contemporary history, and his failure to claim for Swinburne the title which we have already suggested for him, the greatest poetical representative in English of the world movement called romantic humanitarianism. And yet Mr. Drinkwater has, after all, a lurking feeling somewhere in the dark glowing depths of his critical conscience that a great English poet must be a good Englishman. And so with a noble—one is tempted to say, with a jolly—inconsistency he harps again and again on the somewhat esoteric idea that if the plain man could be duly purified and magnified, he would feel more like Swinburne than like any other English poet. For, says Mr. Drinkwater, "the material that Swinburne took was that element in English poetry that through five centuries had corresponded with the general characteristics of the English tongue and metaphysic. And so his achievement became in a curious degree representative of the English people. We have greater poets; we have none of whom it can be said with such finality that we alone could have produced him." This is interesting and patriotic, but partly unintelligible and wholly unconvincing.

The Truth About Woman. By C. Gasquoine Hartley (Mrs. Walter M. Gallichan). New York: Dodd, Mead & Co. $2.50 net.

Mrs. Gallichan differs from most writers in this field in showing no disposition to harass the brute male. Men may differ with her—in self-defence they must—but they will find her genial, reasonable, and possessed of a large outlook upon life. In her view men are not less moral than women, though less religious; and they are not grosser in matters of sex, but only more downright—a rare admission for which men should be grateful. Yet she supports the superstition that men are lacking in parental affection. Women, again, are not physically weaker than men, nor by nature less endowed with initiative. Nor are they more unselfish. "No one can have failed to note the immense egoism of the modern woman," who, through "an over-consciousness of rights," is in danger of becoming "intoxicated with herself." Yet in art, though woman has accomplished little, she is the only sex fitted to succeed—this conclusion rests upon the fallacy of "superior intuition."

And, after all, women are superior. By a copious use of the material of biology and anthropology, mostly at second hand, it is shown that life is "essentially female" and that the male is (in the words of the late Lester F. Ward) "an afterthought of Nature," created merely for purposes of fertilization by an asexual female (monstrum horrendum!); and, further, that the earliest state of socicty was matriarchal—or does this mean only that, for obvious reasons, blood-relationship was reckoned along the female line? Mrs. Gallichan is too candid not to reveal the weakness of this favorite feministic argument. But what does it all matter? Does "fertilization" mean that there is no inheritance of paternal traits? And because female superiority prevails up to the time of the amphibians, are we to become amphibious—or pre-amphibious? Or because the two husbands of the hermaphrodite cirripede reposed in the pockets of their wife, does she expect us to do the same?

All this goes for nothing in the "Modern Section," where Mrs. Gallichan speaks for herself. She has no love for the asexual female. On the contrary, she believes that the true happiness of women is to be found on the side of home and children; and that, even in public life (for she is a suffragist), there is an essentially feminine task to be done which is worthy of the highest intelligence. She deplores the entrance of women into business, though she asserts, quite justly, that present social conditions make it unavoidable. And she especially deplores all competition with men, all strife and jealousy of the sexes. Even in industry women should at least consider what men prefer to have them do. Somewhere among the possibilities there must be a peculiarly feminine work which will not only vindicate the rights of feminine intelligence, but bring women into cordial and generous coöperation with men. In matters of detail it must be said that Mrs. Gallichan's ideas are more or less vague. Her chief contribution, beyond many pregnant observations, is a generous and clear-headed sobriety. Her advice to women is to "come out and be common women among common men."

If this idea were generally accepted, there might perhaps be more doing and less of the feministic assertion of "what women can do." If a woman has done something very good, what but an invidious implication is contained in the statement that it is done by a woman? Mrs. Gallichan herself is disposed to make much of the demand that woman must be "free." Yet it is proper to ask in what sense woman is not free. Can it be meant that a novel, a picture, a poem, is judged less admirable when the author is a woman? Or that, in the case of a surgical operation, men would deliberately prefer to risk their lives at the hands of a demonstrably inferior male? The truth is rather that, in all fields, an excellent work by a woman tends to receive somewhat more than its just share of praise. It is a common charge of feminists that men are jealous of an intellectual woman. Yet most men would testify to the peculiar delight afforded by conversation, or cooperation, with a woman of fine intelligence. Under present conditions, however, the so-called "intellectual" woman is apt to be a person deficient in human sympathies, one who prefers a professional occupation to the enjoyment of family life. Now men have an equal aversion for the "intellectual" man, but we remember that most of the men engaged in intellectual occupations are husbands and fathers; as a matter of fact, your college professor is a highly domesticated animal. The truth must be faced that the combination of domesticity with an intellectual career, which is rendered easy and normal for the man, is for the woman extremely difficult. In this sense woman is clearly not "free," and the prevailing uneasiness shows that freedom has become a problem. But the conditions of her bondage have been neither created nor maintained by men. The real criminal is Nature, who has ordained that only women can be the mothers of children. A steady grasp of this fact would do much to divest the subject of its unpleasantness and might assist both men and women in devising some solution of the problem. Meanwhile, it is well to ask, with Mrs. Gallichan, whether success in the occupations of men is a necessary test of feminine intelligence and dignity.

The Married Life of Queen Victoria. By Clare Jerrold. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $3.75 net.

One need not be even middle-aged to remember the time when the name of Queen Victoria was a word to awake reverence, not only in England, but all over the English-speaking world. The demonstrations of the jubilee-year were not perfunctory or local. They reflected a real sense on the part of Christendom that the Victorian reign had made, in countless ways, for progress and civilization, and a general advancement in well-being to be strongly if vaguely apprehended by any intelligent subject or citizen. How far the Victorian Queen was to be held responsible for what had happened during those fifty years was a question which few good subjects or citizens thought of urging. The beginning and end of the matter was that for half a century this little woman had been "The Queen, God bless her"—a living symbol of England's greatness.

Since the death of Victoria, most books about her have been written gently and with caution, lest the kindly tradition of her be disturbed. Her son's popularity as King no doubt tended to deepen the kindliness of that tradition. Certain official or semi-official publications, such as the recent excerpts from her diaries, have taken care to present her to posterity in the most amiable light. This is all very well, but the obituary spirit has its limitations. Even funeral baked meats cease to be palatable after a time. The truth is, few intelligent persons, in England or elsewhere, would, if put to it, allege that the worthy woman who gave her name to an era was in her own right a great Queen. She wished to be that, she believed in her sacred authority and in her ability to exercise it. For a time, under the influence of Prince Albert, the throne seemed to be making some progress towards the absolutism which both were ready to assume if they could. But meddling with dispatches and scolding ministers were illusory means to the desired end; and after the death of the Prince Consort, that little boom in royal prerogative, such as it was, collapsed forever. The two ambitions which Queen and Empress never outgrew were that her husband should be remembered as a great man, and that their married life should stand as the supreme exemplar of a pure and happy union.

Neither ambition has been quite attained. The present volume undertakes, in not too delicate a spirit, to explain why. Prince Albert is shown as a well-meaning, hard-working young man, who had been placed in a most difficult situation, and did as well with it as he could, under all the conditions. He had been brought up as a potential husband of the young English Queen, but his master, Stockmar, had not thought it worth while to make an Englishman of him. Before his marriage he knew little of English politics, or, what was worse, of English society. True-born Britons distrusted him as a foreigner—one of the "marrying Hapsburgs," and his stiff manner and German accent were at once held up to ridicule by the caricaturists and broadside-writers of merry England. Our author gives a very full account of the attentions of these gentry. Their freedom is amazing. They hurl gross insults at their young Queen and her Albert, they howl, they hiss, they leer. And it is plain that they express the emotions of the people. England came in time to recognize the faithfulness and usefulness of the Prince—to the Queen; but never ceased to regard him as an interloper and a nuisance to herself. His stiffness, his secretiveness, his lack of humor—above all, perhaps, a certain acquisitiveness and "closeness" in money matters—kept him from the hearts of his wife's subjects. Of her own heart there was no doubt; yet (here again our author somewhat too obviously exults) their marriage was not the unruffled communion of two perfect natures which the Queen loved to make it out. The young pair hardly knew each other at the time of their wedding. The Queen was arbitrary, the Prince was, fortunately, a man. The fact that such rank as he might have hoped for had not been given to him perhaps put him on his mettle. At all events, there were quarrels. Victoria threw tea in Albert's august face; Albert locked Victoria out: in the end, and in a creditably short time, he established the fact that even a mistress and queen should have a lord and master. The point once made, there was little trouble to follow. It was the Queen's nature to depend on some man. Her dependence on Melbourne had been attended with some tinge of emotion. Her allegiance to Albert was destined to become an allegiance of mind and will as well as of heart. If he was not King of England before he died, he had at least made himself Queen. This writer's sense of the composite character of England's sovereign during those later years is facetiously indicated by his habitual use of compounds like "Victoria-Albert," and "the Queen-Prince." Taking them purely as a married pair, he thinks better of the husband than of the wife. He believes that Victoria's pride in Albert was a pride of possession; that her love (and frequent jealousy) were selfish; that she always thought of herself first, and of her husband as relating to her. The book, in short, though it throws some light on the private characters and relations of the royal pair, is malicious and ungenerous in tone. It represents a crude reaction against Victoria-worship.

John of Gaunt's Register. Edited for the Royal Historical Society by Sidney Armitage-Smith. Two volumes. Camden Third Series., XX, XXI. London: Office of the Society.

Few people interested in the formation of an English Cabinet have any knowledge of the history and functions of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. It may be recalled that the office, like some other political offices in England to-day, is a sinecure, and is usually given to a Minister whose assistance is necessary to a Government; and it may likewise be recalled that John Bright once described the Chancellor as the maid of all work of the Cabinet, and that the office was held from 1892 to 1894 by the retiring British Ambassador, James Bryce. But why he should bear the exalted name of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, and who is the "Duke of Lancaster," and where are the lands of the "Duchy," probably few have been zealous enough to inquire. Behind the phrases, which are largely mere survivals, lies a long history, dating back to the fourteenth century, when there was a real Chancellor, a real duke, and a real duchy that played important and living parts in the affairs of the time. But the reality is gone to-day; the chancellor of a vast feudal estate has become a useful party ally, a member of the Cabinet, but not of sufficient prominence to undertake the duties of an important department; the "duke" has been merged in the king; and the lands of the duchy, scattered over several counties of England and managed by subordinate officials, are now crown lands, the revenues of which accrue, not to the Exchequer, but to the sovereign as part of his private income.

The Register of John of Gaunt, edited by Mr. Armitage-Smith, is the roll of grants, charters, and leases of the ancient possessions of the Dukes of Lancaster, as they existed in the reign of Edward III. These possessions at that time embraced territories in nearly every part of England and Wales, and over them the dukes enjoyed extensive rights comparable only with those which the King himself possessed. Many of the rights the King himself had granted, and thus the Duchy of Lancaster was one of the greatest, if not the greatest, of the feudal immunities in England in the Middle Ages. Though at the time when this register was drawn up, 1371-1375, the duchy as such had not come into being, and though for two centuries, until after the dissolution of the monasteries, additions continued to be made, nevertheless, the lands in the hands of John of Gaunt were already under a management and control that was as complete and unified as was that of the duchy proper under Henry IV. To all intents and purposes the duchy was a miniature kingdom, except that its lands were widely scattered, and its administration was so elaborate and complicated as to require almost as many officials and as much machinery as did the administration of the kingdom itself. How this vast estate was managed and how the many different parts were welded together into a unified whole this register tells us in great detail, and the information thus furnished Mr. Armitage-Smith has epitomized in admirable fashion in his preface. The duke had his council, with chancellor, steward, chamberlain, controller, and receiver, and below them were numerous officers varying in dignity, rank, and function. These men were concerned with finance, law, hunting, homage, and the household; and stewards, receivers, feodars, and their subordinates were divided into groups, each with its given territory. For the student of feudalism the most important documents in the volumes are those that disclose the relations of lord and tenant and the obligations for war service.

The material here printed forms but a small part of the large collection of private muniments belonging to the Duchy of Lancaster that were presented to the nation by Queen Victoria in 1868.

The Story of Harvard. By Arthur Stanwood Pier. Boston: Little, Brown & Co. $2 net.

The unique distinction of Harvard University lies in its great traditions. It is possible for other universities to equal or, indeed, surpass it in resources, number of students, renown of teachers, and general prestige before the world, but there are three hundred years through which her history runs like a red thread of honor, from the first obscure founding of Anglo-Saxon America to the present moment. This is a possession which cannot be taken away. The Harvard traditions have a value inestimable, and it is of high importance that the story should be known and appreciated.

A well-meant effort towards this end, like the book of Mr. Pier, deserves a welcome. The book is small, sketching in two hundred and fifty pages the record of the institution, with pleasant descriptions, at the outset and close, of life at the University to-day. Mr. Pier summarizes well the accounts of the more formal historians, Josiah Quincy and Benjamin Peirce, and draws abundantly from the letters and diaries of Harvard men of every period. His style is dignified, yet easy, and he shows good judgment in selecting for mention characters and events that deserve to be made salient. Little fault can be found with his presentment, except that it is incomplete. The book, indeed, seems meagre, when one thinks of what it might have told. For instance, as to Harvard's modern period, no time is better worth an emphasis than that of the Civil War, and Mr. Pier properly accords it extended mention. He has nothing to say, however, of the Confederates and their part, but there were noteworthy men among these. W. H. F. Lee, a distinguished cavalry leader, with many of the traits of his great father, was for a time a member of the class of 1858. About the same time the president of the Hasty Pudding Club was McKim, who laid down his life for the South; and the class-orator, in 1855, was James B. Clark, who served devotedly throughout in the Twenty-first Mississippi. They were good men, if misguided, and merit at least a word of recognition. As regards the Federal soldiers, to whom our author confines himself, he ought to have gone beyond the "Harvard Memorial Biographies," apparently his only source. Francis C. Barlow, for instance, the most brilliant of the Harvard soldiers, the only one, we believe, who on commemoration day had attained the full rank of major-general, won by exposures, wounds, and achievements almost unexampled even in that time, is quite ignored.

As to the earlier period, it is a sad oversight to forget entirely Henry Vane, whose connection with the college, though, indeed, most transient, was yet very momentous. As Governor of Massachusetts Bay in 1636, he presided over the meeting which founded the college, and it was his voice that declared the vote valid, the creative word which gave the institution being. He sat that day in his chair of state, a youth of twenty-four, his great career all before him, with the long hair which had given offence to the soberer Puritans, attired in courtly fashion, with the mien which Clarendon afterwards portrayed as "unbeautiful," though making "men think there was somewhat in him of extraordinary." Mindful of the grim pomp he had seen in the camps and courts of Europe, he had at his back a row of stalwart halberdiers, armed cap à pie—an incident in the Harvard story most picturesque, and deeply memorable. Here, certainly, Mr. Pier did not use his opportunity.

Every good story has a prologue, and the story of Harvard has one which by no means should be left out. In Stratford-on-Avon stands the "Old House in the High Street," identified by the most eminent of our antiquaries, the late H. F. G. Waters, by certain documentary evidence, as the early home of Katharine Rogers, mother of John Harvard, from whom proceeded the little inheritance that first kindled in the Western Hemisphere the torch of a liberal culture. For this we have distinct contemporaneous chapter and verse. At circumstantial evidence we look askance, but without pressing the matter unduly this may be said—that the families of Rogers and Shakespeare lived in close neighborhood and intimacy at Stratford during the reigns of Elizabeth and James I; that the poet knew Katharine Rogers well, as, on the other hand, he knew well Robert Harvard, at length her husband, in his shop at Southwark, in London, hard by the Globe Theatre. So far the conjunction would seem to be inevitable. Then looms up a possibility amounting perhaps to a likelihood, that no other than Shakespeare was the intermediary who brought together the Londoner and the fair, well-dowered maid in the remote Midlands, that he was a familiar guest in the home in Southwark which he had helped to establish, and that he, the genial family friend, held on his knee the little John Harvard, the first-born in the household. Could this touch of their foster-father with the most illustrious name in literature be fairly established (and who can say after the feats of Mr. Waters what scraps may yet be found in the dust-heaps?) Harvard men would indeed have a tradition to prize.

Mr. Pier's estimates of characters and events we think in general correct. We omit nothing which he has included, but an adequate portrayal of the noble story of Harvard should have in it much that is here left out.

Notes

New books of the Cambridge University Press (Putnam) include: "The Puritans in Power, a Study in the History of the English Church from 1640 to 1660," by G. B. Tatham; "Lectures on Dryden," by A. W. Verrall, and lectures "On the Art of Writing," by Sir A. Quiller-Couch.

Charles Welsh's "Studies in the History of Children's Literature" will be brought out early next year by the World Book Co., of Yonkers, N. Y.

"Whigs and Whiggism," a collection of Disraeli's political writings, edited by William Hutcheon, will be brought out by Murray, of London, uniform with Mr. Monypenny's biography.

Bibliotheca Sacra Company, of Oberlin, O., announces the publication in January of "English Literary Miscellany," by Prof. Theodore W. Hunt, of Princeton. The volume contains thirteen essays which have appeared in Bibliotheca Sacra, covering the entire range of English literature.

The first session of the nineteenth International Congress of Americanists will be held at Washington, D. C., from Monday, October 5, to Saturday, October 10, 1914. Titles of papers to be presented at the meetings of the Congress should be sent as soon as possible to the secretary, Ales Hrdlicka, United States National Museum, Washington. It is also essential that a synopsis of each paper be placed in the hands of the secretary before July 30 of next summer.

"A Year with a Whaler" (Outing Publishing Company), by Walter Noble Burns, is still another example of the growing habit of sowing in the forbidding soil of hard labor and uncongenial surroundings on the chance of reaping a golden harvest later, at the hands of the booksellers. Mr. Burns has no unusual gift as a writer, but manages to keep a strong current of life throughout the 250 comfortably large-typed pages of his story. The scenes of the author's adventures were mostly in the whaling regions of Alaskan and Siberian waters.

"Hunting the Elephant in Africa" (Macmillan), by Capt. C. H. Stigand, differs from the book of James Sutherland, noticed in these columns some months ago, in that Capt. Stigand is not primarily a professional elephant hunter, with an average of nearly one bull elephant per week to his score for a decade past, but an army officer, explorer, and field naturalist, who hunts elephants or other big game occasionally, as the spirit and opportunity suggest. The elephant hardly more than justifies his place of honor in the title, since above half the chapters deal either with other forms of hunting or with the natives, the natural features of the country, and various other topics naturally suggested to a writer of Capt. Stigand's keen powers of observation. The closing chapter is a spirited attack upon the theory of protective coloration in insects. Col. Roosevelt contributes a short introduction, giving a scarcely needed assurance of the author's competence in the field covered by his book, and lamenting that he is too diffident in telling of his own achievements.

It is difficult to understand how Violette M. Montagu could have written so dull a book on a subject that appeals so strongly to the imagination as does that gentle Irish priest who mounted the scaffold with Louis XVI ("The Abbé Edgeworth and His Friends," Brentano's). The narrative halts and rambles pitifully forward and backward through time and place. Yet the author doubtless believed that history should be interesting, for her brief bibliography of historical authorities consulted includes Hugo's "Quatre-vingt-treize," Dumas's "La Route de Varennes," and Balzac's "Les Chouans." The publishers have been at pains to make a thoroughly mediocre volume outwardly attractive.

The conviction that the eighteenth century in France was the century of the adventurers will be strengthened in any one who reads the new volume on "D'Eon de Beaumont: His Life and Times" (Badger). The authors, MM. Homberg and Jousselin, make plain that in this series of adventurers, D'Eon was the pure type to which his other eighteenth-century colleagues, Cagliostro, Napoleon, Mesmer, and the Illuminati generally, were but imperfect approximations. He loved mystification and adventure for their own sakes; and if, after having been a captain of dragoons and a minister plenipotentiary to England, he assumed and kept for forty years the title and garb of Mlle. D'Eon, we suspect that it was the result of nothing deeper than his incurable hanker for the sensational. The authors are inclined to exaggerate the part which the Chevalier played in the secret diplomacy of Louis XV and to explain too much on this score. Considering D'Eon's cleverness, it proves nothing that in his feminine rôle he should have imposed upon Beaumarchais, whom he tartly described as "one of those by whom one must be hated to retain one's self-respect." And if he succeeded in deceiving Beaumarchais, it was natural that Louis XVI and Vergennes, for whom Beaumarchais was negotiating, should likewise have been deceived. The author of the "Mariage de Figaro," who incidentally had himself won his spurs as an adventurer, has discussed his dealings with the Chevalier at considerable length in his "Memoires." Unfortunately, however, it is as difficult to believe Beaumarchais as it is to understand D'Eon. The present authors tell us that they have based their work on documents in the Archives of the Ministry for Foreign Affairs and on a collection of D'Eon's papers recently discovered. If this is so, the newly discovered papers told us nothing not previously known. The method followed is that of easy narration rather than that of rigorous history. This is as it should be, for in spite of the long and serious attempts to assign to one or the other sex this adventurer who was a credit to neither, D'Eon does not belong to history, but only to history's chronique scandaleuse. The acceptable translation, by Alfred Rieu, makes it an entertaining story of an amazing life.

Louis XIV made himself the exclusive centre of radiance at Versailles and succeeded so successfully in drawing all eyes towards his own person that people have paid relatively little attention to his brother. In order to focus some light on the latter, Mr. Hugh Stokes has put together in an entertaining but uncritical volume entitled "A Prince of Pleasure, Philip of France and his Court, 1640-1701" (Brentano's), a mass of references to Philip which he finds in the seventeenth century memoirs and gossipy letters. Philip of Orleans was the father of the Philip who ruled as Regent in 1715, and the direct ancestor of Louis Philippe, who played the part of King of the French after 1830. His family offers interesting material for the student of eugenics. With the same parentage as Louis XIV, Philip lacked altogether most of his brother's notable characteristics; he had no dignity, no control of himself, no manners, no aptitude for politics; only in the looseness of his morals did he much resemble his royal brother. All in all, he was a contemptible prince and a foolish husband. By his first marriage, however, to Henrietta Anne of England, he became of some political importance; for Henrietta was the able sister of the restored Charles II. She was sent by Louis XIV in 1670 to arrange with the English King the shameful secret treaty of Dover and was often entrusted by Louis with secrets of state which were withheld from her shallow and suspicious husband. This was not conducive to domestic harmony in the Orleans household. Any possibility of such harmony was banished by the fact that Philip became absurdly obsessed by the Chevalier de Lorraine and lavished upon him the affection and money which he owed to his own wife. In fact, when Henrietta suddenly died in 1670, it was commonly believed that she had been poisoned by her husband and his favorite. After her death Philip married the clever Palatine princess known in literature as "Liselotte," but his life with her was no happier than with Henrietta. Besides being entertaining, Mr. Stokes shows how the personal motives and private hates in this Orleans family were allowed to influence, to a small extent, the trend of international relations in the reign of Louis XIV.

"Lyrics and Poems from Ibsen" (Dutton), collected and arranged by Mrs. F. E. Garrett, with an introduction by Philip H. Wicksteed, is a collection of certain poetical translations made by the late Edmund Garrett, many of which appeared from time to time in the Westminster Gazette. The volume contains a complete version of "Brand," a rendering of Aase's death scene from "Peer Gynt," translations of twenty-eight of the "Digte" and of five songs from the dramas. In almost every case the metre of the original has been reproduced in English, and the work is most of it excellent. Garrett seems always to have been a careful literary workman, usually to have caught admirably the spirit of the Norse poems, and often to have become a true poet himself. Although his version of "Brand" was written very rapidly, it is in the main highly successful. In the lyrical passages of work thus hastily done he is not at his best. The exquisite "Agnes, min dejlige sommerfugl" has eluded him, as it has baffled every previous attempt at translation. The scene from "Peer Gynt," the beginning of a projected translation of the entire poem, is so good that the completed version would probably have been by far the best one in the language. It is the main body of lyrics, however, that will command the readiest interest. Garrett's versions of these poems ought to extend the knowledge and appreciation of this least-known aspect of Ibsen's genius. One feels more and more the truth of Professor Brandes's remark, quoted by Mr. Wicksteed, that at some point in the battle of life Ibsen had a lyrical Pegasus shot from under him. In one of his verses the poet suggests that he deliberately neglected his lyric gift to fight the battles of mankind:

> What is life? A fighting
> In heart and in brain with Trolls.
> Poetry? That means writing
> Doomsday accounts of our souls.

In some of these lyrical translations we see the mysterious and illusive Ibsen whom we already know, as in "Spillemaend" ("Musicians"), which Garrett translates as follows:

> My thoughts went out to her nightly
> The silvery summer through;
> But the path bore down by the river
> In the alder-wood wet with dew.
> Ha! Song with a shudder in it
> Is the spell for a woman's will,
> That through halls and high cathedrals
> Her dream be to follow thee still.
> I called from the pool the Kelpie;
> I sold my soul for his art;
> But when I had mastered his secret
> She lay at my brother's heart.
> Through halls and high cathedrals
> I played my way alone;
> And the shudder and song of the torrent
> Has made my soul their own.

Sometimes we discover a new, startlingly direct, and simple Ibsen, as in "Borte" ("Gone"):

> The last, late guest
> To the gate we followed:
> Good-bye—and the rest
> The night wind swallowed.
> House, garden, street
> Lay ten-fold gloomy,
> Where accents sweet
> Had made music to me.
> It was but a feast
> With the dark coming on;
> She was but a guest,—
> And now, she is gone.

Lovers of Ibsen's "Digte," or longer lyrics, will find most of them admirably translated in this volume, and some of them superbly—notably "Stormsvalen," "Ederfuglen," and the tremendous "Paa Vidderne."

The uninstructed reader, on encountering the "Diamond Sutra," really endorses Max Müller's comment that "at first sight it may seem as if this metaphysical treatise hardly deserved the world-reputation which it has attained." Its singular charm to the philosophical mind is evident, however, in a considerable number of translations into various languages, the latest of which, "Chin-Kang-Ching, or Prajna-Paramita" (Dutton), translated from the Chinese by William Gemmell, places the classic before the English reader in a convenient form accompanied by copious notes. The author of this sutra remains unknown, but its translator from the original Sanskrit into Chinese was a native of Kashgar, who became First Minister of a Chinese-Tibetan Emperor in 405. The work has always been regarded in eastern Asia as one of the two chief documents of Mahâyâna Buddhism. Like the Confucian Analects it takes the form of question and answer, but its contents are utterly unlike the ethical and biographical matter of the Chinese classic. Like the Christian Gospels this is supposed to come directly from the Master. When asked by what name the scripture should be known "the Lord Buddha replied, saying, Subhuti, this scripture shall be known as 'The Diamond Sutra,' the Transcendent Wisdom, by means of which we reach the Other Shore. By this name you shall reverently regard it. And why? Subhuti, what the Lord Buddha declared as transcendent wisdom by means of which we reach the other shore, is not essentially transcendent wisdom—in its essence it transcends all wisdom." The philosophical nihilism of Buddha disclaims any idea of formulating a creed. "There is no law," he is quoted as saying, "by means of which a disciple may be defined as one having attained supreme wisdom." Such a statement seems to warrant Rhys David's contention that Dharma is not "law" as usually interpreted, "but that which underlies and includes the law." The process of reasoning permeating this sutra and, applied alike to names and things, inevitably disposes of them all as unreal. Thus, "What are ordinarily declared to be systems of law are not in reality systems of law, they are merely termed systems of law." Mr. Gemmell supplies a useful introduction to his translation, dealing with the meanings of fundamental Buddhist terms. He has made a little book that every Christian missionary in eastern Asia ought to own and study.

A recent volume of the Loeb Classical Library (Macmillan) contains Petronius with a translation by Michael Heseltine, and Seneca's "Apocolocyntosis" with a translation by W. H. D. Rouse. There has been no complete translation of Petronius for more than half a century, during which period a great deal has been done for the elucidation of an unusually difficult and in places obscure author. Hence a new translation is welcome. This version is well done on the whole. The section containing the "Cena Trimalchionis" will at once be compared with Professor Peck's version of "Trimalchio's Dinner," to which it is much superior in taste. It suffers, to be sure, from too much English slang, but slang seems to be inevitable in a translation of Petronius. Obscene passages are reprinted in the Latin, even when the obscenity is confined to a small portion of a sentence. This gives a curious appearance to many pages, and makes an unpleasant impression, although it was probably necessary in a version designed for general use. While absolute exactness is not to be demanded in a translation, this version shows far too many quite unnecessary inaccuracies, with occasional downright errors. A single example will serve as a type. In §42 we read: "Medici eum perdiderunt, immo magis malus fatus; medicus enim nihil aliud est quam animi consolatio." This is rendered: "The doctors killed him—no, it was his unhappy destiny; a doctor is nothing but a sop to conscience." Here the change in sentence structure is unnecessary, as the literal rendering would make excellent English, while "sop to conscience" is a strange blunder. The translation of the "Apocolocyntosis" by Dr. Rouse was made, as he tells us, many years ago. It has apparently not been revised, for there are too many actual mistakes for us to believe that this represents his present attitude towards accuracy. Thus at the very outset we find this curious rendering: "Si quis quaesiverit unde sciam, primum, si noluero, non respondebo"—"Ask, if you like, how I know it. To begin with, I am not bound to please you with my answer." And yet translation is an art! There are some unsuccessful attempts at giving the spirit of Greek phrases by pseudo-biblical reminiscences. The verse passages are often very cleverly reproduced in rhyme, but the tone is sometimes open to criticism. Altogether we might have expected something much better from this distinguished scholar.

A thoroughly charming book is "Roman Farm Management" (Macmillan), being the treatises of Cato and Varro done into English with notes of modern instances by "A Virginia Farmer." The charm as well as the practical value of the ancient works on agriculture, both Greek and Latin, has often been recognized by cultivated farmers, as recently by David Buffum in the Atlantic Monthly for September, 1911. The present book is also noteworthy because under the nom-de-plume A Virginia Farmer probably lurks the personality of Fairfax Harrison, railway president, director in numerous corporations, and financier. We have then here a proof not only of the enduring hold of the Classics, but of the little acknowledged truth that classical culture can go hand in hand with the insistent demands of modern business life. Only that portion of Cato is included which pertains to Agriculture. Varro is given entire. The translation, while free, is so good that the difference in style between the two authors can be readily appreciated. It is, moreover, in excellent taste. That, however, which adds particular charm to the volume is the use of modern instances illustrative of the statements of the text, taken from the author's own experience or from his wide reading. A vein of humor runs through these notes which adds point to the criticisms. This is sometimes combined with practical additions. Thus at the close of the translation of Cato, as a note upon Cato's directions for curing hams, our Virginia Farmer adds "A Virginia Recipe for Curing Hams," followed by "A Virginia Recipe for Cooking Hams." He says finally: "To be thoroughly appreciated a ham should be carved at the table by a pretty woman. A thick slice of ham is a crime against good breeding."

In "Jena to Eylau" (Dutton), Freiherr von der Goltz traces in detail, almost day by day, the disastrous retreat of the old Prussian army during the four months from October 14, 1806, to February 8, 1807. It is a continuation of his previous volume, "Von Rossbach bis Jena und Auerstedt," and covers much of the same ground as the excellent volumes of Von Lettow-Vorbeck. But it is more readable and less technical than most military histories and contains many interesting military observations of general application. "The events of this night [after Jena] stand for all time as a warning against the mistaken kindness of sparing an army in time of peace." "Fearlessness obtains more than subservience from the great men in history." He explains the Prussian débâcle after Jena as due not so much to cowardice or panic as to the degenerate and artificial conception of the art of war and of the soldiers' calling which obtained in heads of the octogenarian Prussian generals. They had underrated the danger and not made the supreme effort at the outset; when the blow fell at Jena they quickly gave up fortress after fortress in the vain delusion that in so doing they should facilitate an early peace and lessen the sufferings of the people. The lesson of the past which he draws for his countrymen of the present is that a long period of peace, like that following the Seven Years' War or the war of 1870-71, with increasing wealth and comfort, causes military dry-rot. He exhorts Germans to be on their guard against all half-heartedness in military effort, against "diplomatic generals," and against the tendency to overvalue technical training in officers and to undervalue the importance of intense sustained effort, even in time of peace, on the part of the common soldier. These observations have weight as coming from one who was trained under Moltke and Prince Frederick Charles, and who recently reorganized the Turkish army; the fact that the latter went down to a defeat as complete as that of the Prussian army in 1806 was due in part to defects for which the organizer was not wholly responsible. In fact, Jena to Auerstedt is paralleled in more than one respect by Kirk-Kilisse to Tchataldja; it remains to be seen whether Turkey can show a moral and military regeneration through defeat comparable to that of Prussia after 1806. Capt. C. F. Atkinson's translation is adequate, but his maps are atrocious; it is a pity that he did not reproduce the excellent maps of the German original.

In William Stone Booth's "Wonderful Escapes by Americans" (Houghton Mifflin), a score of narratives, some of them hardly more than anecdotes, are collected. The editor's object has been, he says, "to present an unhackneyed series of engrossing and true stories." That they are true we cannot doubt, or that, almost without exception, they contain the material of engrossing fiction. But alas, being fact, they cannot be fiction, and their style is the hackneyed and unilluming style to which the purveyors of mere fact, for the most part, seem condemned. Artists like Defoe and Poe have pretended to use that style. They have kept the dry tone and worn phrase of your earnest chronicler. But they have slyly illumined it, so that while they seemed to be illustrating the superior strangeness of fact over fiction, they were really bringing home the superior charm of fiction over fact. The effect of these pages is the less satisfying because it is not clear what part of them is the work of the editor and adapter and what part is drawn from his original sources. He has confined his work, he says, "to the simplification, condensing, and clarification of each narrative. Where an adventurer tells his own story, his own words have been followed as closely as possible. . . . Quotation marks have been avoided in the text, but the breaks in the original form have been clearly indicated by the interpolations." We do not understand what this means, since there is seldom anything in the form of the page, or in the style, to distinguish interpolation from text.

The incidents chosen by Mr. Booth cover a wide range of American adventure. War, shipwreck, piracy, the trail, the Fugitive Slave law, exploration, flood, fire, and tornado, yield their several opportunities for hairbreadth escape. There is plenty of material here for a thrilling book, but such a book cannot be made by compilation. Certainly there is little in this one to tempt a second reading. One of the illustrations (facing p. 16) is the most striking thing in the book. It is almost as delightfully confusing to the eye as Hogarth's print of False Perspective. At first glance we see a small boat with a single sail bearing down upon us. A man seems to sit in the bow, facing us, his back to the mast. Then we observe a ship in the offing, and the legend beneath the picture, "He edged down towards her." We look again, and perceive that the sail bellies the other way, that the man grasps a tiller, and that in the confusion attending a shipwreck the jury-mast has evidently been shipped in the stern of the ship's boat instead of in the bow. The primary illusion is cunningly fostered by that humorist the illustrator, not only by facing the mariner the wrong way, but by introducing the detail of a shark's fin cleaving the wave in the opposite direction from that in which the boat is really going. Need we say that there is no shark mentioned in the narrative?

There must be something about Chile that conduces to dryness. Possibly it is the nitrate deserts of the north, or it may be "Sandy Point" in the Straits. Whatever it is, it has had a marked effect on most of the books that have been published in English about that republic. There never was a much dryer book than Hancock's "History of Chile." Scott Elliot's "Chile" is the least interesting of any of the volumes in Scribner's Latin American series. And now we have another heavy, albeit useful, volume called "Progressive Chile," by Robert F. Mansfield (Neale Pub. Co.). The author evidently lived for some time in South Central Chile and is very familiar with the agricultural region. Unfortunately he appears to know nothing of the nitrate fields and still less of the great copper mines, which is all the more singular when one considers the title of the book, for it is becoming increasingly evident that Chilian progress must be along mineral rather than agricultural lines. One-fifth of the book is devoted to an excellent chapter on Classified Husbandmen. It is carefully written and contains material not accessible elsewhere. There is no index, no map, and there are no pictures except the frontispiece, A Pair of Spurs, which we take to be the author concealed as a Chilian ranchman. The public libraries will need to add it to their shelves, but zealous indeed must be the reader who can grow enthusiastic over it.

The rapidity with which new titles appear in the Cambridge Manuals of Science and Literature (Putnam) indicates that its ideal of scholarly treatment in brief compass has found an appreciative market. The serial number had reached fifty a year ago, and twenty additional volumes bear the date of the current year. As to subject-matter, the catholicity of the editors has no apparent limit. Such themes as "The Modern Warship," treated by Edward L. Attwood, of the Royal Corps of Naval Constructors, and "Wireless Telegraphy," by C. L. Fortescue, professor of physics in the Royal Naval College at Greenwich, do not crowd out a new epitome of "The Moral and Political Ideals of Plato" or a consideration of "Mysticism in English Literature." These two subjects, by the way, have been assigned to women, Plato falling to the lot of Mrs. Adela M. Adam, of Girton and Newnham Colleges, while Mysticism is treated by Caroline F. E. Spurgeon, Docteur de l'Université de Paris, now lecturer in Bedford College, of the University of London. The literature of America is referred to in this volume as "rich in mystical thought," but because of the restrictions of the author's plan, writers on this side the Atlantic are rigidly excluded, with the exception of a brief paragraph on Emerson, as influenced by Swedenborg and passing that influence over in turn to Carlyle, Mrs. Browning, and others. A volume on "Ancient Babylonia," by C. H. W. Johns, attempts, in the author's words, merely "to summarize, without argument or discussion, the results now generally admitted as probable," in view of the almost unmanageable finds of modern excavators and the greatly enhanced importance of native sources since the decipherment of the Behistun inscription of Darius the Great. The work of the University of Pennsylvania and the University of Chicago in this field is briefly mentioned. The subject of "Comparative Religion" is considered by Prof. F. B. Jevons, under the various aspects of sacrifice, magic, ancestor-worship, the future life, dualism, Buddhism, and monotheism. The object of the study of Comparative Religion, as he expresses it, "is not so much to ascertain what we men think as what we feel and how we act," the study of one important and interesting way in which our personality expresses itself. A volume on "English Monasteries," by A. Hamilton Thompson, aims especially to give a brief description of the plans of monasteries, with the position and use of their principal buildings. The first chapter is devoted to an historical sketch of the monastic orders.

F. Sydney Eden contributes a volume to the Cambridge series on "Ancient Stained and Painted Glass," including under that heading anything prior to the year 1700. The closing chapter embodies an earnest appeal for some organized effort to preserve the stained windows still remaining from days of old in English churches. His suggestion is the creation of local councils endowed with statutory authority to protect all such ancient monuments within their territory, the written consent of the council to be necessary even to the slightest repairs. One volume is given to "The Vikings" and another to "The Icelandic Sagas," the two agreeing as to the justification of the Norsemen's claim to the discovery of the American coast about the beginning of the eleventh century. In the field of economics two volumes are added, "The Theory of Money," by D. A. Barker, of the Indian Civil Service, and "Copartnership in Industry," by C. R. Fay. Mr. Barker's book is confessedly in large part a digest of recent American literature on the subject, and he unhesitatingly admits that such American writers as Laughlin, Kemmerer, and Irving Fisher have carried the theory of money definitely beyond the point reached by Professor Jevons. A few pages are given to the subject of bimetallism, which is declared, however, to be of no great practical value. "Beyond the Atom," by Prof. John Cox, who worked for nine years with Professor Rutherford in the physics laboratories of McGill University, is a sketch of the discoveries in radio-activity described more fully for the specialist in the works of Rutherford and Mme. Curie. Among the results achieved in this field, according to the author, is a removal of the quarrel between the physicist, who would have the earth a molten mass 100,000 000 years ago, and the geologist, to whom this allowance is all too short for the deposition of the stratified material on its surface. The power of the newly discovered radio-active elements indefinitely to retard the cooling process gives to the geologist "a blank cheque on eternity" for all the time he needs, while the physicist is subject to no discredit for not having taken into account factors not then known to exist. Other volumes in the domain of physics are "The Earth: Its Shape, Size, Weight, and Spin," by Prof. J. H. Poynting; "The Atmosphere," by A. J. Berry, and "The Physical Basis of Music," by Alexander Wood. Biology adds two new titles, "Bees and Wasps," by Oswald H. Latter, and "The Wanderings of Animals," by Hans Gadow. "Submerged Forests," by Clement Reid, is credited by the publishers to geology, though the author warns his readers that there are some subjects which cannot be fitted into any hard and fast system of compartments of scientific knowledge.

The volumes in this series average about one hundred and fifty pages, are illustrated where illustration can be of real service, and are provided each with a select bibliography and a fairly full index. The treatment is scholarly, as thorough as the brief space limits will allow, and yet for the most part within the mental grasp of the intelligent reader who is not a specialist. They are sold at a uniform price of forty cents.

Developments in Auction Bridge follow one another with such startling rapidity as almost to justify the plethora of literature devoted to the game. The first to expound the latest count in volume form is Florence Irwin, who tells us in "Auction High-Lights" (Putnam) all about the Nullo count. "Nullos" are the "misère" of the antediluvian Solo Whist applied to Auction, and may be described as negative No-Trumps. They have the same value as Hearts, the latter taking precedence in the bidding, and the player bids for so many tricks less than the book of six. Miss Irwin makes a strong plea for the Nullo count, holding that it tends to minimize the element of luck in Auction. We are glad to observe that she agrees with the majority of the best players of Auction in discountenancing the absurd artificiality of the "high spade convention," which was introduced early in the year, and threatened at one time to strangle the game. Her arguments against any such arbitrary conventions are explicit and entirely sound. The thirty-six test hands which the author gives are well selected and should prove an interesting study for the advanced players for whom the book is intended.

"The Auction Bridge Book" (Dutton), by Capt. H. S. Browning ("Slambo" of the Westminster Gazette), is an imported volume and illustrates in its scope the conservatism of British card players. "Royal Spades" or "Lilies," which have been universally adopted in this country for more than twelve months, are advocated in the last chapter of his book as a pleasing innovation, which the author hails as "the game of the future." He is likely, however, to modify his expressed opinion that the introduction of Royal Spades involves no radical change in the game of Auction. Experience with the new count here has shown that it has revolutionized the system of bidding. Capt. Browning's book is professedly written for the beginner and the moderate player, who will find in it a clear exposition of the underlying principles of Auction, although the fact that the Royal Spade bid is dealt with only as an afterthought cannot but detract somewhat from its value.

The Rev. Dr. Herrick Johnson, who died at Philadelphia on Thursday of last week, aged eighty-one, was a national figure in the Presbyterian Church and was well known as an author. Among his books are "Christianity's Challenge," "Revivals, their Place and Power," "Plain Talks about the Theatre," "From Love to Praise," and "The Ideal Ministry."

Prof. John Eastman Clarke, head of the department of education of Boston University, died Saturday at his home in Cambridge, Mass. Professor Clarke was born in Prospect, Me., in 1850. He graduated from Boston University in 1878, and in 1882 obtained the degree of Ph.D. in the same college. In 1909 he was elected professor of philosophy at Boston University, and later professor of education in the College of Liberal Arts and Graduate School.

The death occurred at Paris on Saturday of Etienne-Auguste-Edouard Simon, usually known as Lockroy. He was born in 1838 and was one of the best known French statesmen and writers. As a member of various Cabinets, first as Minister of Commerce, then of Public Instruction, and finally as Minister of Marine, he was highly successful. During the siege of Paris in 1870 he commanded a battalion of infantry. Many of his writings on naval questions were widely read.

Science

THE NATIONAL ACADEMY OF SCIENCES.

The autumn meeting of the Academy was held in Baltimore at the Johns Hopkins University on November 18 and 19. Twenty-two papers were read, nearly evenly distributed between the physical and biological sciences, only a fraction of which can be mentioned here. T. H. Morgan, of Columbia University, in a paper on "The Constitution of the Chromosomes as Indicated by the Heredity of Linked Characters," undertook to demonstrate a modification of Mendel's law of the quantitative basis of inheritance when more than one pair of characteristics are inherited at the same time, and to relate these to the division of the chromosomes in the cell. As an example, suppose that a yellow and a green pea are bred together, and that the yellow quality is dominant; then the hybrid contains the chromosomes or cell-nuclei denoting both yellow and green. In the next generation the characters will appear in the ratio of one yellow, one green, and two appearing yellow, but able to transmit both yellow and green. The yellows breed true with their own kind, the greens with theirs, but the others give yellow with yellows, and green with greens. If now there is another pair of characters, such as being round or wrinkled, these are inherited in a similar manner. If the yellow pea is round, and the green wrinkled, according to Mendel it would be an even chance whether the round character stayed together with the yellow, and the wrinkled with the green, or whether they exchanged, but Professor Morgan finds that in the great majority of cases the characters stay together, or are linked. Various examples, both botanical and zoölogical, were described.

In a paper entitled "The Action of Vital Stains Belonging to the Benzidine Group," H. McL. Evans, of the Johns Hopkins Medical School, described the action of certain dies which undergo no chemical changes when introduced into the body of an animal, but affect it in a very remarkable manner. The introduction of a cubic centimetre of trypan-blue into the peritoneal cavity of a mouse is followed in a few minutes by a strong blue coloration of the nose and ears, as was plainly evident in the lively small beasts handed about. This color persists for weeks without disturbing the animal. On the other hand, with azo-blue, no such effect takes place. It was shown that slight displacements of the sulphonic acid radical in the molecule caused the difference between positive and negative vital stains. The effect was shown to be due to the colloidal nature of the dyes, the positive dyes having the property of rapid diffusion, the negative none, the difference being due to the size of the particles of the dye.

S. O. Mast, of Johns Hopkins University, in a paper on "Changes in Pattern and Color of Fishes," with special reference to flounders, shows that the flounder possesses a great advantage over the leopard in that he can change his spots to a very appreciable degree, for the purpose of making himself invisible against the background of the bottom of the sea. In the first of a number of photographs the flounder was absolutely invisible against the background of mud covered with shells, which his mottled skin closely imitated. The background was then changed several times, and a series of checked or striped patterns placed under him. Although in every case the pattern was changed in a remarkable degree, from nearly black to nearly white, it was shown that the flounder could not imitate the background with any great exactness, especially in the case of stripes. He can perceptibly adopt various colors, showing color vision. As to how he is able to do this, and whether he can see the whole surrounding background with his two eyes on one side, it was decided, by placing one eye on one color and the other on another, that although two effects were produced, the adaptation is influenced chiefly by the pattern near the eye, and that no very close imitation of the background is produced.

This session was concluded by the reading by the veteran academician, Dr. S. Weir Mitchell, of a touching tribute to his friend, Dr. John S. Billings, to which members listened with an interest seldom manifested in biographical memoirs.

In Wednesday's session Dr. Simon Flexner, of the Rockefeller Institute, discussed "Some Factors in the Epidemiology of Infection." These were not the effects of climate on insect or dust-borne germs, or the effect on the skin or mucous membrane, but other causes inherent in pathogenic organisms, causing changes in virulence. If the micro-organism is capable of being grown outside the body, it may tend to a diminution of virulence; while inside the body its virulence is enhanced. At times a sudden increase of virulence takes place, as in the case of plague, streptococcus, or infantile paralysis. In the case of the latter disease, due to an ultramicroscopic germ too small to be filtered out, it has been found that there is an extraordinary gain of virulence in passing it from one monkey to another. At the Rockefeller Institute this disease has been for four years thus transmitted, and has been longer continuously under observation than any other germ. Its power rose and remained constant for three years, when it suddenly lost its high degree of virulence and failed to kill.

L. B. Mendel, of Yale University, in a paper on "Factors Relating to the Rôle of the Inorganic Components of the Diet," showed the action of various foods on the neutrality of the blood. It is possible to introduce acid into the blood without making the latter acid, it being the function of the kidneys to maintain the neutrality. Too much acid causes œdema, or accumulation of fluid, or nephritis. The acid may be removed by excretion in the urine, which changes in its solubility for uric acid. It is generally known that it is desirable that this should be easily soluble in the urine, but Professor Mendel shows the effect in increasing this solubility of a large number of foods, particularly fruits and vegetables.

Dr. H. A. Kelly, of the Johns Hopkins Hospital, reporting on "Radiotherapeutics in Surgical Affections," gave an account of the remarkaole success of the use of radium in the treatment of cancer, and stated that this was at present the most hopeful treatment of that disease. The action of the radium rays is quite different from that of the X-rays, and while burns are sometimes produced, they are not permanent nor dangereus. The action of the radium is very prompt, and it does not necessitate long confinement in a hospital, nor does it interfere with the resort to surgery in case of its failure. A number of photographs showed the startlingly rapid and complete elimination of cancerous growths, sometimes in a few days. It was stated that the sooner a patient applies for treatment the more likely the possibility of effecting a cure.

A. H. Pfund, of Johns Hopkins University, described the measurement of stellar radiation by means of a wonderfully sensitive thermo-couple used in vacuo, and placed in the focus of the thirty-inch reflecting telescope of the Allegheny Observatory. The sensitiveness is so great that the heat of a candle could be detected at a distance of eight miles. Good-sized deflections were obtained from Vega, Jupiter, and Altair, and with a more sensitive galvanometer these would be much increased. J. A. Anderson, also of Johns Hopkins, explained a method for testing screws, by which the new screws for ruling diffraction engine gratings are tested and brought to perfection by the application of an optical interferometer on the screw before mounting. The use of these methods enables the art of ruling these gratings, made famous by Rowland, an art lost after his death, to be again successfully practiced.

G. F. Becker, of the United States Geological Survey, and A. L. Day, of the Geophysical Laboratory of the Carnegie Institution, described "Fresh Experiments on the Linear Force of Growing Crystals," showing that small crystals forming from solution might sustain and raise a weight of eighty kilograms, and that apparently negative results were explained by an imperfect distribution of the pressure.

A. G. Webster, of Clark University, exhibited a new portable phonometer, or instrument for measuring the loudness of sound, the present instrument being for a particular pitch nearly as sensitive as the ear, and giving the measurement in absolute measure. The instrument was used by L. V. King, of McGill University, Montreal, who, in a paper entitled "Phonometric Characteristics of Fog-Signal Equipment," described the exploration of the acoustic field of the fog signal at Father Point, on the lower St. Lawrence, this being the first such survey ever made, for lack of a suitable measuring instrument. It was shown how the sound frequently falls off in an irregular manner, owing to the varying temperature of the air over the currents in the water. The output of sound energy in the horn was studied by an ingenious application of a resistance thermometer to obtain the temperature of the air before and after passage through the sounding apparatus.

In the business meetings several matters of importance for improving the efficiency of the Academy were discussed, particularly the publication of regular proceedings. It is safe to predict that the Academy is now entering on a career of increased usefulness and greater distinction. Mention must be made of the enjoyable social courtesies provided by the Baltimore members, including a reception by ex-President and Mrs. Remsen and a dinner at the Maryland Club.

Drama

Shakespeare as a Playwright. By Brander Matthews. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $3 net.

To judge from internal evidence, this is in part a compilation of matter prepared for professorial lectures to college classes. And naturally it traverses much familiar ground. But it possesses some distinctive merits. It is attractive in style, quotes freely and aptly from acknowledged authorities, exhibits full and accurate knowledge, and discriminates carefully between what is actually known—giving chapter and verse in support of its assertions—and the more or less plausible deductions of guesswork. Thus the sketch of Shakespeare's life, with which it begins, while inclusive of every trustworthy detail brought to light by modern investigation, rigorously rejects every uncorroborated legend. It is a scholarly and conscientious bit of work.

Professor Matthews is equally sound and careful in his description of the conditions prevailing on the Elizabethan stage. And his analyses of the Shakespearean plays, their origin, structure, and authenticity, are full, shrewd, and perceptive. But in his main endeavor to determine the chronological order of them from their general literary and constructive character, and so to trace the course of development of the author as a dramatist and poet and to define his status as actor and manager, he is apt to be more fanciful and ingenious than convincing. It is only fair to add that he is never unduly dogmatic, but readily admits the conjectural quality of his arguments. Many of these are sufficiently plausible, but others, as he sees, are controverted by indisputable facts. What he really proves, if unconsciously, is that the whole subject is involved in such uncertainty that it is impossible to formulate a consistent theory concerning it. One of his difficulties is to account for the comparatively adroit stage-craft displayed in a piece admittedly so early as "The Comedy of Errors," and the slovenly construction of some of the far more notable plays which followed it, the sudden access of skill in the tragic masterpieces, and the disappearance of that skill in later productions almost equally remarkable for poetic genius. It is an interesting problem, but there are so many known and unknown terms to the equation that any attempt to solve it now seems hopeless.

As to the notion that Shakespeare, like many of our modern play-makers, devised certain characters to fit particular actors, that may or may not be true. It is not quite so plausible, perhaps, as Professor Matthews seems to believe. We know nothing, or very little, of the actual histrionic accomplishments or abilities of the Elizabethan players. The reputation of Burbage himself may almost be called mythical. All that we can safely assume is that in tragic parts he pleased his auditors better than anybody else. But we have no standards of comparison, no such records as exist of the manner and methods of the great actors of a later generation. Shakespeare, writing for a stock company, must have known, of course, what players would be likely to be cast for his characters, whether tragic or comic, but to hold that his inspiration was in any way limited, or greatly influenced, by his comprehension of the histrionic capacities of particular performers is to adopt more than one violent presumption. It implies either that Shakespeare might have written better than he did, had he not been fearful of overtaxing his interpreters, or that his leading actors, some of them boys, were incomparably greater artists and geniuses than we have any reason to suppose. It is altogether probable that Shakespeare may have devised a line of business, or an occasional phrase or episode, with some special player in mind, but this is as far as speculation can safely go. Like other dramatists, he had to be content with the best players he could get.

An interesting feature of the book is two maps, one of London at the end of the sixteenth century, showing the places with which Shakespeare was identified, and the other of the same neighborhood as it is to-day.

In our issue of November 13 Lady Gregory's "Our Irish Theatre" was wrongly credited to Henry Holt & Co. It is published by G. P. Putnam's Sons.

"Nowadays" is a three-act comedy by George Middleton, which Holt will shortly publish.

Mr. G. K. Chesterton's "Magic," which he calls a fantastic comedy, is announced for immediate publication by Putnams.

"Cymbeline," a posthumous volume by Horace Howard Furness, will soon be added as Vol. XVIII to Furness's New Variorum edition of Shakespeare.

The first appearance of Forbes-Robertson in this country as Shylock was awaited with much interest. He never attempted the character in London until his farewell engagement at Drury Lane, although he had played it in Manchester and elsewhere. Some of the English critics described his interpretation as a new reading, in which a certain fictitious nobility was imparted to the Jew by representing him as inspired by racial and religious zeal. Henry Irving, undoubtedly, tried to do something of this kind when, in the latter half of the trial scene, he assumed an air of patriarchal dignity. The theatrical effect which he created was most impressive and pathetic, but it was achieved at the cost of consistency. He exhibited two distinct personalities. In his performance in the Shubert Theatre Forbes-Robertson committed no such artistic error. His embodiment, in all its parts, was consistent with itself and with the plain meaning of the Shakespearean text. He made it clear in the beginning that he hated Antonio because he was a Christian and a foe to usury—laying a notably venomous emphasis upon the declaration—and that motive was evidently the mainspring of his subsequent action. In this respect he followed traditional lines, but his portrayal, as naturally would be expected, was nevertheless strongly individual, revealing much more artistic intelligence than power of dramatic passion. In the street scene, in that whirlwind of conflicting emotions—rabid hate, wounded avarice, and outraged affection—he was by no means the equal of Edwin Booth, whose passionate utterance at this point was torrential. He lacked the physical stamina or the histrionic impulse to illustrate the full fury of that storm, but he indicated the ravages of it with unfailing comprehension and infinite dexterity. His acting, in this crisis, was at least equal to that of Irving and only second to that of Booth, but disappointed the expectation aroused by his masterly work in the opening acts, in which his ideal of Shylock—a man full of latent strength, keen, supple, vindictive, and sardonically humorous—was sketched with extraordinary vitality and elaboration of detail. Here his elocutionary skill and his power of facial expression were displayed to great advantage. No actor of recent days, not even Booth, has so charged the lines of the Jew with vocal significance. And in the first half of the trial scene he was equally successful, playing with remorseless and malignant intensity, and his portrayal of utter collapse, after Portia's triumph, if less theatrically effective than more violent agitation, was certainly more pathetic and perhaps more true. His Shylock, although conservatives may carp at some of the little touches of modern realism which he introduces, will be accounted one of the three best known to this generation, while his representation of the comedy as a whole has been excelled only by Irving.

"Grumpy," the new play which Cyril Maude has produced at Wallack's, is an ingenious and interesting melodrama, though not calling for critical consideration. But his performance of the central character, an octogenarian lawyer, who undertakes the solution of a criminal mystery in which his domestic happiness is involved, is uncommonly clever. His portrayal of an enfeebled body animated by an energetic will and an arbitrary but affectionate temper, showed a remarkable mastery of all the merely external mechanism of eccentric comedy. Mr. Maude is evidently a very able actor; that he is a great one is yet to be proved.

Mr. Chesterton's "Magic," recently produced at the Little Theatre in London, seems to have puzzled the critics a good deal. A. B. Walkley writes of it:

You never know what he is driving at, for the excellent reason that he hasn't begun by knowing it himself; one fancy, or one word, suggests another à la fortune du pot. Thus the word "vegetarian" suggests the fancy "militant vegetarians," and "militant" suggests Joan of Arc, and Joan suggests anti-vegetarianism because of her famous stake (steak—oh, no! decidedly Mr. Chesterton is not particular), and so on.

Edward Milton Holland, who died suddenly in Cleveland on Monday, aged sixty-five, although never numbered with the great actors, was a performer of substantial ability and sound training. His death inflicts upon the stage a loss which it can ill afford in these days. For many years he has occupied a distinguished place among American comedians, being recognized everywhere as a player of refinement and versatility, gifted with a rich vein of dry humor. He was a son of the famous old comedian, George Holland, so long associated with the Wallack stage, and he himself made his first appearance before the footlights on those celebrated boards in 1855, when he was only seven years old. He was Master Thompson in "Parents and Guardians." One of his best achievements was his Gerridge in "Caste," and he was also an excellent Cool in "London Assurance." After brief experiences at Booth's Theatre and the Union Square, he became a member of the company at the Madison Square Theatre in 1883, and took a prominent part in many of the productions made there. A notably successful impersonation on his part was his Captain Redwood, the detective, in the successful play, "Jim the Penman." He made another hit in "Captain Swift," and gave an excellent performance of Gregory Goldfinch in "A Pair of Spectacles." He won great praise, too, afterwards in Palmer's Theatre, with his Col. Moberly in "Alabama," and his Col. Carter in "Colonel Carter of Cartersville." In 1895 he scored an emphatic success in "A Social Highwayman." For the last ten or fifteen years he has acted in many different parts in many theatres all over the country, and always with a liberal measure of popular approval.

Music

Berlin heard its six hundredth performance of "Lohengrin" on October 15. The first was given in 1859, the one hundredth in 1876. The only two operas which have exceeded this number of performances in Berlin are Weber's "Freischütz" (693) and Mozart's "Don Juan" (654); but these had many more years to reach those figures.

An interesting Chicago concert, which might profitably be copied in other cities, was given by the Symphony Orchestra there on November 15. The programme was devoted entirely to American music. Three composers, who are members of the National Institute of Arts and Letters—G. W. Chadwick, Edgar Stillman Kelly, and Arthur Foote—conducted compositions of their own. MacDowell was represented by his D minor concerto, played by one of his pupils, Edith Thompson. The concert closed with Stock's "Festival March," into which the "Star-Spangled Banner" is woven. Other numbers were the prelude to the third act of Victor Herbert's "Natoma" and Parker's "Northern Ballad."

A notable event in Philadelphia was the first performance in America of Massenet's opera "Don Quichotte," on November 15, under the direction of Cleofonte Campanini. It met with a favorable reception. According to the Musical Courier's representative, "There is every sign throughout 'Don Quichotte' that Massenet felt the thrill of inspiration while writing it, and penned his measures with no lack of the melodic fertility, vocal knowledge, and mastery of instrumentation that characterize nearly every opera created by that remarkable musician."

The London Philharmonic opened its 101st season with a novelty—Richard Strauss's "Festival Prelude." The Philharmonic has a subscription amounting to about $850 a performance. The expenses have in recent years increased 60 per cent., partly because of increased composers' fees, partly because of the need of increasing the number of available plays to 110 from about 75, as in the good old times. Another extra is the cost of providing exotic instruments called for by modern scores. Only seven concerts are given.

Lovers of lyric song will be sorry to hear that Mme. Sembrich has cancelled all her recital and concert engagements for this season. She has moved, on her husband's account, from Lausanne to the milder climate of the Riviera (Nice), where she indulges in well-deserved leisure and a little teaching.

Madame Schumann-Heink has been made an honorary citizen of San Francisco by Mayor James Rolph. "The papers carry with them all the attendant privileges and honors usually granted to distinguished visitors. The honor was conferred upon Madame Schumann-Heink at the close of a great concert in the pavilion, and before an audience of ten thousand people."

Puccini's "Girl of the Golden West" has taken some time to find its way to the opera houses of Germany and Austria. Only recently was the work of the universally popular maestro heard in Berlin and Hamburg, and now it has reached Vienna, where, thanks to an unusually careful performance, it seems likely to establish itself as an accepted favorite by the side of his "Bohême," "Tosca," and "Butterfly." Weeks of careful preparation, under the supervision of Director Gregor himself, a past master in the subtle art of putting an operatic work on the stage, were devoted to the study of the intricate music drama, the smallest parts were entrusted to accredited soloists, and the result has been a well-balanced and satisfactory performance.

The death is reported from Munich of Hans von Bronsart, said to have been a favorite pupil of Liszt. He was born in Berlin in 1830, and was well known both as pianist and composer. From 1887 to 1895 he was intendant of the Court Theatre at Weimar.

Art

The special autumn number of the Studio is devoted to "Peasant Art in Italy," with Sidney J. A. Churchill, Vincenzo Balzano, and Elisa Ricci as contributors. There are numerous illustrations of peasant houses, costumes, and utensils. The heraldic embroideries of Umbria and the semi-Oriental rugs of Southern Italy and Sardinia are fully illustrated. Jewelry is also strongly represented with a number of colored plates, presumably from Mr. Churchill's own remarkable collection. The survey is quite adequate for its purpose, but greater attention might well have been given to the trappings of oxen and horses, and to pottery. Here the plates are quite meagre and some are taken from originals which have no peasant quality.

Archiv für Kunstgeschichte (Leipzig: E. A. Seemann), edited by Detlev von Hadeln, Hermann Voss, and Morton Bernath, is an art magazine of novel type. It offers, with briefest material descriptions, fine heliogravures of works of art which are unpublished or published in unsatisfactory or inaccessible form. In the first Lieferung, which contains twenty folio plates, private collections, German, English, and American, are chiefly drawn on. The editors also mean to reproduce fine works of art which appear transiently at the dealers' or in auctions. The present number ranges from Titian and Ludovico Carracci to Goya. Dutch Sculpture, Hans Leu, Bernard Van Orley, Cranach, are other characteristic titles. Of especially notable quality is a Rubens sketch, Peace and Prosperity, for the decorations at Whitehall. Nothing later than the eighteenth century will be included. The Archiv will be indispensable for museums and libraries where the history of art is seriously studied. At thirty-six marks for eighty plates annually, in quarterly instalments of twenty, it is an astonishing money's worth.

"The Masters of Greek Art" (Macmillan), by H. H. Powers, is a vivid and masculine review of the main tendencies of Greek art and life as reflected chiefly in the art of sculpture. Dr. Powers has the gift of concreteness and contrives to be vivacious and even drastic at times without becoming cheap. At certain points one might be inclined to contest his attributions and estimates. It would require much argument to convince your reviewer that the marvellous Demeter of Cnidus is of Praxitelian inspiration. Again, Dr. Powers is perhaps unduly scornful of the stylism of Polyclitus. Such schematization was a perfectly authentic expression of one side, and by no means the worst, of the Greek genius. Precisely this strong flavor of personal likings and dislikings makes the book interesting, and injects into a much hackneyed theme an element of the unexpected. While the work will not fail to interest any specialists whose generalizing faculty is still alive, its chief public should be found among college students and the more intelligent sort of tourists. To this public it may confidently be recommended.

Eleanor Rowland, in "The Significance of Art" (Houghton Mifflin), discusses painting, sculpture, music, and the minor arts. The weakness of most writing on æsthetics she attributes to the fact that the authors are generally either psychologists unversed in art or artists unskilled in introspection. Miss Rowland is evidently at home in both fields, and her book, which is a result of teaching, is clear, unpretentious, and stimulating. Her especial point of originality is the assertion of a law of materials. Sculpture is bound by the very limitations of bronze and marble to typical representations especially expressive of weight and mass. Music, though in every way freer, is still conditioned by the conventions of the notes and their harmonies. Painting is an almost unconditioned art, its material being negligible. The crude statement of these positions does no justice to the fairness and ingeniousness of Miss Rowland's argument. Occasionally her law of material drives her to rather untenable propositions. That no statue less than fourteen inches high, or in wood, or colored, is in the full sense sculpture seems a pretty hazardous maxim. Has Miss Rowland ever seen a really good lacquered wooden statuette of the Unkei school? or a monumental Egyptian bronze about four inches tall? or a fine Byzantine ivory? If such things are not in the completest sense sculpture, it would be interesting to learn what they are. Not to urge natural differences of opinion, Miss Rowland's affirmation of the natural divisions between the arts is wholesome and an excellent beginning for analysis within the respective territories. Even if we cannot chart the boundaries precisely, we may hope to reduce the debatable ground. The students are to be congratulated who receive instruction of the grade suggested by this stimulating little volume.

Mr. Somers Clarke, the author of "Christian Antiquities in the Nile Valley: A Contribution Towards the Study of the Ancient Churches" (Clarendon Press: Frowde), is already known to many from his earlier writings, especially his interest in the preservation of St. Paul's Cathedral in London, threatened as it is by the excavation of the London subways. His concern for a modern work of Christian architecture is quite in accord with the self-sacrificing solicitude evident in the efforts he has put forth in this volume to gather and preserve some account of the early Christian churches of the Upper Nile. As a matter of fact, very little has been done in this direction. Butler's volume was not primarily architectural, and Mileham's study covers only the churches of Lower Nubia. The neglect, or even wanton destruction, of these buildings by such men as Grébaut, when in charge of the antiquities of Egypt, has justly aroused indignation. Mr. Clarke began his survey of the ground among the meagre ruins of Soba on the Blue Nile, some thirteen miles above Khartum. Thence he proceeded northward, down the river to El Medyna. His many visits to the Nile in earlier years, combined with especial studies for this particular work, have enabled him to present in this volume a fairly complete survey of the ecclesiastical buildings along the Nile, from the union of the two rivers to Middle Upper Egypt. The studies are not highly detailed, and the plans are not elaborate, but in a field so little investigated they form a distinctly valuable contribution. As a product of the southernmost reach of Christianity, this hybrid architecture along the Nile, simple and unpretentious as it often was, is not a little interesting. In the structure of the great White Monastery, the home of the famous community near Sohâg, we find, nevertheless, a work of imposing proportions and impressive design, of which Mr. Clarke's plans and studies are the first adequate presentation to the modern world. They are especially welcome after the notoriously incomplete and incorrect discussion of the place by Amélineau, who even mistook the insignificant edifice now serving as the church for the sanctuary of the ancient monastery, a really imposing building, as Mr. Clarke shows. The relation of these buildings to Byzantine architecture on the one hand and to their earlier Oriental ancestral types on the other is a study of great importance, in which future archæologists and historical architects will find plenty to do. Only students of art and of the ancient world can appreciate fully the painstaking devotion with which the author has gathered together these fragments of an early chapter in Christian architecture and preserved them from destruction. If we have any criticism to offer, it is chiefly that the author has made no use of the camera, which often records invaluable details not discernible in a drawing.

John de Wolf, landscape architect, who made extensive changes in Prospect and Carroll Parks, Brooklyn, and the City Hall Park, Manhattan, died in Bristol, R. I., on Sunday, at the age of sixty-three. He had studied in Europe and this country. While in Europe on one occasion he designed the Villa Maria, Lake Como, Italy. He was employed for years as topographer and hydrographer of the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey.

Finance

DULL TIMES IN WALL STREET.

Last Monday, the total transactions on the New York Stock Exchange actually fell to the smallest total of any full business day since 1888. Last September the trading on the New York Stock Exchange was 75 per cent. of the total scored in the same month of 1912. Last October it was slightly over 50 per cent. of a year ago. During the five full days of last week, barely one-third as many shares changed hands as on the same days of last year. The weekly total would have been called a dull November business in 1895 or 1894.

In November of 1895, the average daily business, allowing for the Sunday holidays, was 190,000 shares; in 1894, a landmark of financial stagnation, the November daily average was 160,000. Since then the daily trading of the month has reached such heights as the 870,000-share average of November, 1900, the 1,200,000-share average of 1904, and the 720,000-share average even as recently as 1909. During the first half of this present month the daily average business slightly exceeded 200,000 shares; it has not averaged much more than half of that this week.

Such comparisons are easily open to exaggeration or misinterpretation; the tendency displayed may be purely temporary. We had a series of 100,000-share days or less in the first half of last July; Stock Exchange business was all but non-existent. The reason for that stagnation, it can now be seen, was that the market was "sold to a standstill." The result, however, was that the market presently began to rise, simply because the forces of depression had spent themselves. During the next two months a vigorous recovery in prices was under way, with 20 per cent. more business in September than in July. This not unusual experience is the basis for the assumption, fairly common in Wall Street, that if a stock market "goes dead" at the top of a prolonged advance, it means that prices must start moving in a downward direction, and that when the same thing happens at the end of a long decline, a recovery is at hand.

In the present instance, this reasoning would give at least the chance for agreeable inferences; but there are other considerations which offset it. Purely from the standpoint of current earning power, the Stock Exchange is not to-day a cheerful place. Office expenses run on, and 100,000 or 200,000-share days do not meet them. One large house not long ago reported a daily business of 500 shares, based on an out-of-town special wire service which cost $300 a day to maintain. That meant, for the present at any rate, commissions of only $62.50 a day.

When the Stock Exchange market is really active, it is not unusual for the wire service of a prominent brokerage house to turn in buying and selling orders for 25,000 shares a day. When such business falls to 25,000 shares a week, as has been the case of late, the wire service is cut down, so as to take in only very prominent cities, such as Boston, Chicago, Philadelphia, St. Louis, and San Francisco. This means, also, heavy reductions in the clerical forces of brokerage houses in this and other cities.

"Odd-lot" houses, which are seldom able to reduce their clerical forces in slack times, because of the immense amount of detail work involved in direct clearings of small customers, have not paid expenses for months. Orders for fractional lots usually represent one-fifth of the daily sales on the Exchange, and since the three or four houses making a specialty of this business have from six to twelve brokers on the floor, whose seats cost them $60,000 or $70,000 apiece, the firms can never pay expenses when total business of that character falls to the dimensions of the last few weeks. The same thing is more or less true of all other lines of Stock Exchange business. In not a few instances, the pinch of the recent hard times in Wall Street has led brokers to raise loans even on their Stock Exchange seats; for even now as much as $25,000 can be thus obtained to bridge over an unremunerative period.

Whether all this is to change, and when it will change, are among the questions of the day which puzzle Wall Street. In so far as the situation is governed by the investment movement of the day, the answer is easy enough. Most professions strike a fair average of earning power in the long run; but to the Stock Exchange is peculiarly and traditionally reserved the function of earning vastly more than a normal income, in a time of speculative enthusiasm, such as 1901, and balancing that by earning proportionately less in times when the pendulum of speculative activity has swung the other way.

But that leaves the question open, what the future has to offer in the way of better business. It happens that this is by no means the first occasion on which Wall Street has fallen into its present condition of despondency over its own business future. In 1894 and 1896, particularly, the familiar Wall Street comment was that all the great leaders were dead, and that Stock Exchange business was "played out." Early in 1897, with trading at a standstill, and with seats on the Stock Exchange selling at $18,000, members of long standing followed one another in retiring from business; there was nothing in sight to promise better things. The sequel, in the next five years, is sufficiently well known. Nobody supposes that another 1901 is now in immediate prospect; but it is fairly safe to predict the eventual return of the investing public to the market. When, and how, and why that public will return, involves other considerations. No one could have answered the question in 1897.

ALL MEN ARE GHOSTS

By L. P. JACKS

Editor of "The Hibbert Journal," Author of "Mad Shepherds," "The Alchemy of Thought," etc.

STORIES that are studies of life closely related to pressing questions of the time. As in "Mad Shepherds," the deeper philosophical meaning is not obtruded on the reader, who is left to amuse himself, if he chooses, by reading between the lines.

A single thread of intention, hinted at in the title, runs through the volume, suggesting that there are more things in heaven and earth than are dreamt of in ordinary philosophy. $1.35 net.

Animal Communities in Temperate America

A Study in Animal Ecology Designed to Serve as a Reference Work and Textbook. By VICTOR ERNEST SHELFORD, of the Department of Zoölogy in the University of Chicago.

This volume presents the principles of field ecology, illustrated by the more widely distributed animal habitats of the eastern half of temperate North America, and the aquatic habitats of a much larger territory. Six chapters deal with general principles. In several chapters the animal communities are considered from the point of view of modern dynamic ecology. A valuable feature of the book is the three hundred figures of widely distributed animals chosen to represent the chief types of animal communities and their characteristic modes of life.

New Books For All Tastes

Fiction

The Iron Trail
By REX BEACH

"It is Rex Beach's power of description which holds the reader's interest so intently, though his love-story is a good one."—Brooklyn Eagle. "In 'The Iron Trail,' Rex Beach has hit the bull's eye again. . . . We will be very much mistaken if this does not prove to be one of the most popular books that Rex Beach has ever written."—Philadelphia Inquirer. Illustrated. $1.35 net.

The Way Home
By the author of "The Inner Shrine," BASIL KING

"One sees and feels the materialism of our day, nowhere so great, maybe, as in New York. The book is a brilliant and moving demonstration of the thesis, 'Man cannot live by bread alone.' The situations are clear, and skillfully handled, the characters real people. The book interests—holds, moves one. It is a book you want to lend to a friend, and then, when he has read it, sit and talk it over with him. I will preach on it some evening."—N. McGee Waters, Pastor of Tompkins Avenue Congregational Church, Brooklyn. Illustrated. $1.35 net.

The Coryston Family
By Mrs. HUMPHRY WARD

A love story, with a heroine who will rank as Mrs. Ward's most charming portrayal of young womanhood of to-day, and a dramatic representation of the dramatic struggle between the radical and aristocratic elements of English society. As a rich, sombre background against which the youthful love episodes stand out, is pictured the desperate efforts of a forceful woman to hold her power. Illustrated. $1.35 net.

The House of Happiness
By KATE LANGLEY BOSHER

Mrs. Bosher has found a new field. Her work in it has produced this book, which appeals, perhaps, more deeply to human sympathy than any of its predecessors. There is a love story in it, of course, the wooing of a charming girl by a splendid man; but it is the boy, Cricket, who wins the heart of every reader. Who that knows "Mary Cary" can forget her sweet, sunny nature? Cricket is surely kin to her. Frontispiece. $1.25 net. Autograph leather edition, limited to 500 copies, $1.50 net.

A Changed Man
By THOMAS HARDY

A new book to arouse the keen interest of every Hardy lover—and every reader of stories. These tales are like condensed novels—rich in Hardy's genius and idyllic of the Wessex country. We mingle in the lives of the romantic milkmaid, the dragoon, the knight, Alicia, and the shepherd who saw. Frontispiece. $1.35 net.

The Passionate Friends
By H. G. WELLS

No man's woman is the heroine, a living reality in this new novel. Mr. Wells says some sharp things about our right to live our own lives, and he tells us how one man and one woman did it. "The Passionate Friends" is a good story—and much more. Frontispiece, $1.35 net.

Of Permanent Interest

Familiar Spanish Travels
By WILLIAM DEAN HOWELLS

"A fragrant blend of mellow autobiography, literary associations, romantic history and charming and piquant impressions of travel."—N. Y. Tribune. "A fascinating account of Spanish life and places, all the more important because they are described and interpreted by Mr. Howells's pen. . . . We feel that he has done for Spain to-day as vividly and as faithfully what Gautier did for Spain almost a century ago."—Boston Transcript. Illustrated, $2.00 net.

Miracles of Science
By HENRY SMITH WILLIAMS

The story of the modern miracles of the laboratory and observatory told in popular language free from technicalities, so that the least scientific reader will understand and enjoy it. In fascinating chapters are revealed the latest developments of science in astronomy, physics, chemistry, biology, and medicine. Illustrated, $2 net.

Social and Economic Forces in American History

American life, the manners and customs of our ancestors, from the earliest colonial days, are here described by the distinguished scholars who have contributed to the twenty-seven volumes of the "American Nation." The general reader, as well as the historian, will find these pages full of interest. A work of authority. $1.50 net.

HARPER & BROTHERS

HOUGHTON MIFFLIN COMPANY'S
Illustrated Gift Books

The Carolina Mountains
By Margaret W. Morley

"Seldom has any section been afforded a more sympathetic interpreter of its physical charms, or of the life and character of its people."—Springfield Republican.

Fully illustrated. Boxed. $3.00 net. By mail $3.21.

The Country of Sir Walter Scott
By Charles S. Olcott

"In following Mr. Olcott on his tour through Scotland and England, one has the assurance of being in the hands of a well-informed guide."—The Nation.

60 illustrations. Boxed. $3.00 net. By mail $3.23.

Picturesque New Zealand
By Paul Gooding

"A lively and entertaining description of a land of which we ought to know more than we do. Illustrated with splendid photographs."—New York Sun.

58 superb illustrations. $3.50 net. By mail $3.72.

Mediæval Byways
By L. F. Salzmann

This entertaining volume is practically a companion volume to "Touring in 1600" and "Pilgrim Life in the Middle Ages."

Illustrated. $1.75 net. Carriage extra.

Dandies and Men of Letters
By Leon H. Vincent

"Twelve sketches of famous dandies, historically accurate, vivacious, and kindly." — San Francisco Argonaut.

Illustrated. $3.00 net. By mail $3.20.

The Art of the Great Masters
By Frederic Lees

"The plan of the book is admirable, and its richness of illustration and suggestion deserves all praise."—Boston Transcript.

Limited to 100 copies for America. Beautifully illustrated. $12.50 net. Postpaid.

The Russian Ballet
Text by A. E. Johnson

This beautiful holiday book gives in a picturesque and entertaining way the stories of the sixteen elaborate ballets in the repertoire of the Russian dancers.

Illustrations in color and black and white by René Bull. $7.50 net. Carriage 41 cents.

Scott's Ivanhoe
E. Boyd Smith Illustrations

"Never has this classic appeared in a more captivating guise or one more certain to meet the approval of those youthful readers for whom it is intended."—Milwaukee Free Press.

Fully illustrated in color. $2.50 net. By mail $2.73.

Letters of Alexander Agassiz
With a Sketch of His Work and Life
By George R. Agassiz

"Both the specialist in science and the general reader interested in the development of a singularly strong and variously gifted character will heartily enjoy the work."—The Dial.

Illustrated. $3.50 net. By mail $3.71.

Letters of Charles Eliot Norton
With biographical comment by Sara Norton and M. A. DeWolfe Howe

"For lovers of literary letters this is the book of the year. . . . It is a large and kindly spirit that speaks throughout, the spirit of the finest culture America can produce."—Chicago Record Herald.

2 vols. Illustrated. $5.00 net. Carriage 44 cents.

The Life of John Bright
By G. M. Trevelyan

"A splendid record of one of England's bravest, finest and ablest statesmen. Mr. Trevelyan has done his work well."—Congregationalist.

Illustrated. $4.50 net. By mail $4.68.

A Confederate Girl's Diary
By Sarah Morgan Dawson

"No such intimate diary of the war from a woman's point of view has yet been given to the world, and certainly no diary of such unusual literary merit."—San Francisco Argonaut.

Illustrated. $2.00 net. By mail $2.15.

Hawthorne and His Publisher
By Caroline Ticknor

"A charming piece of literary workmanship. . . . All admirers of America's greatest novelist will find much new material presented in gracious generosity."—Boston Transcript.

2 vols. Illustrated. $3.00 net. By mail $3.16.

Memoirs of Li Hung Chang
Introduction by Hon. John W. Foster

"After this self-revelation of the greatest mind modern China has produced one instinctively studies that extraordinary mask of a face and sees underneath it the index of a character at once just, generous and lovable."—Boston Transcript.

Frontispiece portrait. $3.00 net. By mail $3.17.

Harrison Gray Otis
By Samuel Eliot Morison

"He was a man of whom his country, as well as his State, may well be proud."—Providence Journal.

Illustrated. 2 vols. $6.00 net. Carriage 37 cents.

The Life of Lyman Trumbull
By Horace White

James Ford Rhodes says:

"You deserve the thanks of all students of history for bringing before them the great Senator in an attractive form and by the use of materials that would not otherwise have come to light."

NEW ILLUSTRATED BOOKS

NEW TRAVEL BOOKS

Twenty Centuries of Paris

By MABELL S. C. SMITH

This notable addition to the Crowell Travel Series comprises a study of the great European capital at different historical periods, beginning with the first settlement on its site two thousand years ago. The author is especially well qualified to write on the subject, as her interest in things French has been lifelong. Especially valuable is the description of Paris at the present time, given from an intimate first-hand knowledge of the city. The volume is embellished with 32 full-page illustrations and a good map.

8vo. Cloth, gilt top, $2.00 net

Through England with Tennyson

By OLIVER HUCKEL

An invaluable book for any traveler planning to visit the Tennyson country. Dr. Huckel recently spent several weeks among the English and Welch scenes celebrated in Tennyson's verse, and the results of his pilgrimage are given in these bright, readable chapters. At appropriate points the text is interspersed with quotations from the poems. The illustrations, 32 in number, many of them from photographs by the author, are particularly fresh and interesting, and add greatly to the attractiveness of this fascinating work. A map of the Tennyson country is included.

A NEW BOOK OF EXCEPTIONAL VALUE

THE BOY WITH THE U. S. INDIANS

By FRANCIS ROLT-WHEELER

Fifth Volume of "U. S. Service Series." Profusely illustrated from photographs taken in work for U. S. Government. $1.50.

Each volume of this series must be submitted in manuscript for rigid censorship by the heads of the department of public service with which it deals, thus rendering it free from erroneous or misleading statements. The Bureau of Ethnology and the Office of Indian Affairs have united in giving the author an opportunity to show the American Indian as he really was and is: the Menominee in his birch-bark canoe, the Iroquois in his wigwam in the forest, the Sioux of the plains upon his war pony, the Apache in his arid desert, the Pueblo in his massed communal dwellings, and the Tlingit of the Pacific Coast with his totem-poles. A thread of adventurous search connects the whole.

Previous volumes are "The Boy with the U. S. Survey," "The Boy with the U. S. Foresters," "The Boy with the U. S. Census," and "The Boy with the U. S. Fisheries."

A History of Chess

By H. J. R. Murray. Royal 8vo, pp. 902. With many illustrations. Cloth..... $12.00
Half Morocco $14.00

The aim of this work is three-fold: to present as complete a record as is possible of the varieties of chess which exist or have existed in different parts of the world; to investigate the ultimate origin of these games and the circumstances of the invention of chess; and to trace the development of the modern European game from the first appearance of its ancestor, the Indian chaturanga, in the beginning of the seventh century of our era.

Many books have been written upon the history of chess, but none covers exactly the same field as this work.

"The Most Important Book of the Year"

The Life of Col. Roosevelt

THEODORE ROOSEVELT — An Autobiography

In this stirring autobiography, replete with the most varied and interesting experiences, Col. Roosevelt writes intimately of his life, his philosophy and the achievements which have helped to mould his remarkable career.

During many years no other single personality of the present day has attracted such general attention in national and world-wide policies, and no more vivid picture of contemporaneous history probably will ever be written than Col. Roosevelt's own story of his life.

In its interpretation of Col. Roosevelt's striking personality, this work is not only of national but of international importance.

The book is handsomely bound and is unusually attractive, with illustrations of portraits, facsimiles of various documents, pictures of buildings, localities and other interesting and appropriate matter.

Decorated cover. Gilt top. Richly illustrated. Octavo. $2.50 net; postpaid, $2.75

The Nation

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, DECEMBER 4, 1913.

The Week

President Wilson not only read his first annual message in person, but made it one that could be read. This is not merely a question of style, but of length. Compared with the messages of Taft and Roosevelt, Mr. Wilson has revised his downward by fully 75 per cent. This he has accomplished by leaving out the customary long reports on the various operations of the Government—reports which will be separately submitted to Congress and printed—and concentrating attention upon a few topics, such as our relations with Mexico, the establishment of a system of rural credits, and amendments to the Anti-Trust law.

In all the points mentioned the President followed his known policies. The only surprise of the message is what may be called the political part of it. He urges legislation to bring about an entirely new and uniform method of nominating candidates for the Presidency. This is by direct primary elections throughout the entire country, the National Conventions to be abolished, except for the purpose of framing party platforms; and even then the Conventions would be composed, not of delegates elected for the purpose, but of the party nominees for the Presidency and for Congress. In a word, the President would have the nation adopt what is virtually the system in States like Wisconsin and New Jersey. He gives no hint of the way in which Congress could attack the problem; cites no Constitutional warrant for his recommendation; refers to none of the enormous difficulties, both theoretical and practical, which would obviously have to be surmounted. One thing, however, is certain. Congress and the country will not dispose of this highly contentious subject so lightly as the President appears to be ready to do.

When our income-tax law was first drafted, with the flat exemption of $4,000, it was estimated that the number of persons subject to the tax would be about 450,000. It is interesting to compare with this the following estimate of French incomes quoted by the Paris correspondent of the London Daily Telegraph:

Persons having an income of over
£200,000 a year	20
£40,000 a year	85
£20,000 a year	360
£4,000 a year	3,400
£2,000 a year	9,800
£1,000 a year	51,000
£400 a year	123,000
£200 a year	294,000
£40 a year	8,000,000

This shows somewhat less than 65,000 persons with incomes above $5,000; and interpolated between that limit and the one next below it, we find approximately 100,000 persons with incomes above $4,000. At this rate, allowing for difference of population, the number in the United States would be about 250,000 instead of the estimated 450,000, indicating the greater abundance of good-sized incomes here. But the difference is far more striking when we go lower down; for out of the eight and a half million incomes in France—that is, roughly speaking, the eight and a half million families—eight million fall below a thousand dollars a year. At that rate, there would be only one and a quarter million incomes in the United States exceeding a thousand dollars a year.

Secretary Daniels's first report is hailed as showing that he is "no one-battleship man." Nothing less than two will satisfy him. To such a narrow line has the space between the advocates of an "adequate" navy and the disarmament fanatics been reduced! But it is not this feature of the document that will receive most attention. Even the members of the General Board are frank to recognize "the futility of hoping or expecting that the ships and men its policy calls for will be provided." It is the idea of a "naval holiday" that will have the strongest appeal for the nation. Ten years ago, Mr. Daniels points out, our largest battleship cost $5,000,000; the next Dreadnought will cost $14,000,000. "When," he asks, "is this accelerating expenditure to be reduced?" Accordingly, while heartily endorsing Winston Churchill's suggestion of a vacation of one year in battleship-building, he goes a step further by recommending the calling of a world conference to discuss the matter and see whether the nations "cannot agree upon a plan for lessening the cost of preparation for war." His desire that the United States should take the initiative in the assembling of such a conference will be widely seconded.

For a new party, innocent of the wiles of politics, Illinois Progressives must be granted to be rapid learners. Gov. Dunne, having some "minority patronage" at his disposal, informed the Progressive leaders of just what offices he had set aside for them and their followers, and left it to these leaders to do the "allotting." Were they upset by this strange offer? Not in the least. A few conferences, and the thing was done in a way that could not have been improved upon by the Old Guard. It is true that one little rift remains unclosed. When the offices in question had been placed upon the table, there were strong hopes that everybody would give his endorsement to Mr. Funk, Progressive candidate for Governor last year, for the Public Utilities Commission "plum." It is a good office, and Mr. Funk has fought hard for the party. But for some months Mr. McCormick has not spoken to Mr. Funk, and the other leaders hardly felt like going ahead and giving him the post without McCormick's assent. So the progress of Mr. Funk—to office—halts. The whole affair, however, is reassuring as showing the ability of the Progressives to take their eyes off their lofty ideals long enough to fasten them upon mundane objects.

A period of thirteen days was enough to give Louisiana a revised Constitution. The substance of the amendments is not of much interest outside of that State, the principal one being due to the necessity of improving the State's financial condition. The circumstances of the revision, on the contrary, are of unusual interest. At a special election, held on the last Tuesday in October, the voters empowered delegates to adopt amendments upon two matters, these being named in the act of the Legislature providing for the election and for the Convention. The Convention, however, proceeded to frame and adopt several amendments dealing with other subjects, including an anti-Trust ordinance. This action would not be particularly serious if, as is usual in the case of amendments to a State Constitution, the people had the final word upon it. In the present instance, however, the will of the Convention is absolute. The amendments went into effect the moment they were signed by the delegates, and popular opposition to any of them is limited to protest or possibly to appeal to the State Supreme Court upon the ground that the Convention exceeded its authority.

Commission government came in like a flood on Monday, when 23 third-class Pennsylvania cities, of from 5,000 to 100,000 inhabitants, assumed a modified form of it. Mayor and Council were supplanted by five commissioners, one of whom is elected as chief executive, the others as departmental heads. The Pennsylvania Constitution requires the Legislature to include all the cities of a class in any change in city government. The way towards the present innovation was paved last year by a bill which reduced the councilmen of second-class cities to nine, of whom three should be elected on a general ticket. The need of some kind of reform, moreover, has been demonstrated in the recent mismanagement of funds in certain cities, while there has been a general feeling that the old plan was inefficient. But considering the mixed results with which cities have voted on the commission form in other States, Pennsylvania may think herself lucky that under her law she has not spent the autumn watching a determined majority drag a protesting minority into line.

The issue on which Mayor Shank of Indianapolis has resigned office is one that rises above the level of a picturesque career of the kind that delights the writer of newspaper squibs. Hitherto Mr. Shank has indulged in comparatively harmless pranks in which the friend of the people and the mountebank were sometimes indistinguishable. But when it comes to the Mayor of a city taking sides in a street-car strike to the point of announcing that he would not afford protection to traffic against violence on the part of the strikers, the situation has nothing of the picturesque in it. If the head of a municipality deliberately fails in the first duty of any chief of government, to preserve public order and afford protection to the citizen, he must step out of office. Even the volatile Mr. Shank is aware of this.

While John P. White, president of the United Mine Workers of America, and other officers of that association are on trial in West Virginia, indictments have been found against them by a Federal grand jury in Colorado. They are charged in the Colorado indictments either with attempted monopoly or with conspiracy in restraint of interstate commerce; and the West Virginia indictments, found several months ago, were likewise for offences against the Anti-Trust law. This has a special interest owing to the concern with which President Wilson's action in signing the Sundry Civil Appropriation bill, in spite of its peculiar rider concerning labor unions and farmers' associations, was so widely regarded. Whether these actions against labor-union heads were instituted by the respective local United States District Attorneys with or without consultation with the Department of Justice at Washington, their prosecution is calculated to set at rest any doubts that may have been entertained as to the President's purpose strictly to live up to the declaration he made in signing the Sundry Civil bill.

Comment in the press on the recent meeting of the National Institute of Arts and Letters at Chicago would indicate that we are not yet prepared for an academy of "immortals." But every recurrent December makes it plain that in one field there is, indeed, pressing need for some recognized authority to lay down rules and award honors. The present methods of picking an All-American eleven are arbitrary, uncodified, and productive of much geographical and academic heartburning. The West has long chafed under the arrogance of Eastern exclusiveness, and has gone in for an All-Transalleghanian eleven of its own. Even within the restricted area of the Atlantic seaboard the Thomas Aquinases of football have been having a dreadful time. They are swamped by the wealth of material. They have resorted to the expedient of picking first, second, and third All-American teams, substitute teams, defence teams, and attacking teams, and in many other ways have shown that their courage is not equal to their enormous task. The time for one-man authority in this important sphere has gone. We need a National Academy with headquarters at Washington and officially delegated power to select the champion eleven and bestow honors in drop-kicking, punting, tackling, and bucking the line. We look to see the idea incorporated in the 1916 Bull Moose platform.

Not often does one find in the day's news a more pleasing item than that which came from Philadelphia on Tuesday in regard to the Glenriddell manuscripts of Burns. Here is a rare case of "all's well that ends well"; the conclusion of the affair is as delightful as its beginning was unpleasant. The sale of the precious relics by the Liverpool Athenæum was—in our opinion justly—regarded as something very like a breach of trust on the part of the directors of that institution; and, apart from this aspect of the matter, Scotchmen, and lovers of Burns generally, were indignant that the books, if they left their old repository, should go to a private individual across the Atlantic who happened to covet them and was able to pay for them. Now it turns out that they have fallen into worthy hands, for Mr. Gribbel, the ultimate purchaser, announced at the dinner of the St. Andrew's Society at Philadelphia that he was arranging to restore them to the land of their birth. Few such restorations have been received with such a thrill of genuine pleasure and gratitude as will greet Mr. Gribbel's announcement, frae Maidenkirk to Johnie Groat's.

The story of the construction of the cathedral on Morningside Heights in this city bids fair to fall in with the tradition of church-building in Europe. We have the comparatively leisurely pace at which the work is carried on; not quite so deliberate as Cologne or Milan, to be sure, but sober enough for our electric age. It must be close to twenty years since ground was broken on Morningside Drive, and we are still far from the completed structure. Traditional, too, is the change in architect and plans during the course of the work. In mediæval Europe such changes were inevitable as one generation of constructors succeeded another and put its own ideas and personality into the fabric. Perhaps it is well that a great ecclesiastical monument should embody the doubts, the hesitations, and the changes of mind of men as well as their aspirations and their faith. Rather novel is the decision of the trustees to submit the alternative plans for the completion of the cathedral to the adjudication of the public; but the idea is not entirely new. On a small scale it has been followed in France, where statues and memorials have sometimes been set up on probation.

Newspaper men have no reason to complain of the way they are treated by college professors. There are still plenty of academics to whom "newspaper English" is a synonym for slovenliness, prolixity, and violence; and it would be too much to expect that the "highbrow" element should surrender without a struggle. On the other hand, the number of college instructors in English who are setting up the newspaper ideal for their students is growing mightily. What more could the reporter ask than this tribute from a member of the Iowa State College faculty?

> With all its faults I still believe in the news style as the most efficient style of this modern day for presenting information through the written word. It has been hammered out in the heat and stress of newspaper work to meet the demands of millions for something to compel their attention, interest them, and give them information in the quickest, clearest way. . . . The news sense, the ability to see what is new, and its new meaning to the great world of humanity, is necessary to men in every field of endeavor, but especially to men who write.

Newspaper English at its best has the qualities that its enthusiastic admirers claim for it—vigor, concreteness, directness, and that demand on the attention which comes from dealing with the living facts of a vital, contemporary world. Yet this is no more than to say that a stirring message usually compels fit expression. But newspapers are not always delivering vital messages; yet they are bound to go on the assumption that every day is Armageddon. Then one gets newspaper English at its worst. Let a battle be fought in Mexico, with the attention of a continent hanging upon the issue, and the reporter will rise to his opportunity. But when no battles are fought, when no crises are reaching their climax, what comes out from Mexico? Columns upon columns of vague conjecture, if not worse; of irrelevant facts; of rumors magnified and multiplied, and all this vague matter diluted with repetition, prolixity, tautology, pleonasm, and all the other ills against which the rhetoric textbooks warn us.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier's espousal at Hamilton of free food as a campaign issue has been long foreshadowed, and is shrewdly calculated to appeal to both the St. Lawrence and the prairie provinces. That it does so on different and slightly contradictory grounds will probably be lost sight of in a general glorification of the principle of low tariff rates. To Manitoba and Saskatchewan Sir Wilfrid can promise that a free-wheat measure, operating through the reciprocity agreement with the United States, will throw open the great American market to Canadian growers. Just how this access to a new and higher market will lower the price of flour in Ontario and Quebec it is not easy to see. But it would at least equalize prices, and might destroy the growing monopoly of the Canadian Pacific in wheat shipments, which has been a main factor in the high cost of food stuffs in the East. In the fact that since the passage of the Underwood tariff Canadian meats and dairy products have risen greatly, and are actually sold for less across the border than at home, the Liberals have a powerful appeal for demolishing the tariff wall. Nor is their stand unpatriotic, for they contemplate new preferential rates to England in woollen and cotton fabrics, of no less advantage to Manchester and Birmingham than to their own consumers. But in essence a victory for the Laurier platform will virtually accomplish what the Reciprocity bill of 1911 attempted.

French railways, too, have need of "safety first" provisions, even if their lack of them does not result so disastrously as does ours. There is a familiar ring about the report upon the recent Melun wreck: "The engine-driver ran past three signals set clearly against him." As for steel carriages, it may be doubted if France has so much as heard of them. Yet the schedules are not slow. There is one train on the Northern Railway that has a run of a hundred miles in a hundred minutes, and makes it. The locomotives used on the French railways are more complicated than ours, and hence require closer attention from the driver, who is accordingly left with too little time to watch the track. Here are exemplified our own favorite faults of speed and economy, for it is the super-heaters and the steam-saving devices that have done much to make the engine engross the driver's mind. Suggestions are not wanting for meeting the dangers created or increased by this more rapid travel. In addition to the block system of signals now in use, audible signals for the engineer's benefit are sought for. It is interesting to note, however, that the French railway managers do not seem greatly disturbed over the imperfections of such audible signals as are already employed, since they look with distrust upon anything that tends to reduce the vigilance of the driver and thus renders him less of a man and more of an automaton.

Ex-Chancellor von Bülow's warning to his countrymen against French designs upon Alsace-Lorraine finds pertinent comment in the outbreak of something like open warfare between the inhabitants of Zabern, in Alsace, and the German garrison. If anything is likely to nurture the spirit of revanche in the hearts of the French people it is precisely such extraordinary exhibitions of militarist arrogance as have brought on the disorders at Zabern and have aroused resentment in the Reichstag, a body which, in spite of its large Socialist membership, is not inclined to be any too harsh on the Fatherland's army. The spirit of toleration in dealing with a conquered people which the case of Great Britain has shown again and again to be the safest means of fostering loyalty, still seems foreign to German methods of government. Arbitrary oppression of citizens by the military does more to foster the anti-German feeling in the conquered provinces than all the fulminations of French patriots. And so long as the anti-German spirit is alive in Alsace, the hot-heads across the frontier will make good use of it.

"RECALL" OF THE IVES DECISION.

Figures of the vote at the last election in New York State on the Constitutional amendments have been coming in very slowly, but they leave no room to doubt that Amendment Number Two has been ratified by a heavy majority. This result was a foregone conclusion. There was virtually no opposition. The amendment removes all limitations which the New York Constitution might otherwise be construed to place upon the power of the Legislature to enact laws for the protection of the lives or safety of employees or for any desired system of workmen's compensation for injuries or death. Yet this highly important amendment was not only passed by two successive Legislatures, with very little difficulty, but went to the people with the explicit endorsement even of newspapers of the most extreme "capitalistic" type.

The decision of the Court of Appeals in the Ives case, pronouncing unconstitutional the workmen's compensation act drawn by the Wainwright Commission, was the occasion for this amendment of the State Constitution. In the opinion of some excellent lawyers, that decision was an instance of that extreme interpretation of Constitutional restraints which for a long time was prevalent among our courts, though it is now in a fair way to disappear altogether, and is in distinct contrast to the spirit shown for some years past by the Supreme Court of the United States. That Court has unanimously upheld an employers' liability act whose constitutionality had been disputed on essentially the same grounds as those asserted in the Ives case; and in a number of decisions concerning the scope of the police power it has laid down doctrines based upon liberal interpretation.

This Ives decision has furnished no end of capital to Mr. Roosevelt and his followers. They have pointed to it as showing the urgent need of his scheme for the recall, or reversal, of judicial decisions by popular vote. Now the object has been accomplished, not only with great ease, but with great promptness, while leaving the functions of the judiciary unimpaired; yet there is no telling but the Rooseveltians may regard this not as a disproof, but as a vindication, of their position. "It is true," they may say, "that you have found it easy to amend the Constitution, while we have been talking as though it were next to impossible; but wouldn't our way have been much better? Why not just set aside the objection to the particular law you want, instead of going to the length of amending the Constitution itself? If the Court was wrong in its interpretation, would it not be best simply to reject this in the specific instance, and let the future take care of itself?"

The plea is not without plausibility. But there is a fundamental and fatal objection to it. The process of popular appeal upon specific decisions cannot possibly be limited to cases in which the Court's interpretation of the Constitution is "wrong." It is bound to work out in practice as simply a vote on the disputed legislative measure; and, however sound and wise may have been the decision of the Court as a matter of Constitutional interpretation, the people would vote it down if they wished the measure enacted. Indeed, the Colonel, in his most recent statement of the recall-of-decisions project, drops the Constitutional element completely, the question to be put to the people being simply whether the law in controversy shall stand or not. It is a tenable position that we should be better off without any written Constitution; it is a tenable position that, even with a written Constitution, the judiciary should have no power to declare laws unconstitutional. But to have a written Constitution, and to give the courts the power to pass upon the validity of a law under it, and then to permit Constitution and judicial decision alike to be reduced to so much waste paper whenever a popular majority desires to have its way in spite of them, is a palpable absurdity.

One feature of our judicial system which is clearly in need of alteration is pointed to in the situation arising out of the adoption of Amendment Number Two. The United States Constitution contains a provision essentially identical with that in the State Constitution upon which the Ives decision was based. It is by no means inconceivable that if the validity of a compulsory workmen's compensation act, passed at Albany this winter, were to be challenged as a violation of the Constitution of the United States, the Court of Appeals might decide against the law. Probably it would not, since the Supreme Court's precedents would then be binding; but it is possible that the new law would involve some feature not covered by the precedents. Now, if the Court of Appeals were to decide against the law as violating the United States Constitution, an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States ought to be possible. But it is not. Under the Federal statutes, such an appeal does lie from a decision upholding the law, but not from a decision invalidating it. This is an anomaly, though it is not difficult to see how it may naturally have arisen. But all that is required to remove it is the passing of an act of Congress. This ought to be done at a very early date. It would remove a real grievance. The matter has been brought forward from time to time, but has apparently been neglected out of sheer inertia. It would be a particularly happy stroke for Senator Root to advocate this reform and push it to speedy accomplishment.

EUGENICS AND COMMON-SENSE.

A decided reaction from the first fine frenzy of the militant eugenists is revealed in the latest literature on the subject. It is a reaction based less on the fundamental principles of the new "science" than on the application of such principles; based less on the contention that eugenics is utterly wrong than on the contention that we do not know enough of the subject to justify us in formulating definite rules of conduct for individuals or the state. From the eugenic laboratories in England, where the doctrine had its origin, there now come warnings against the dangers that lie in overhasty assumptions and generalizations. This was the tenor of Professor Bateson's speech at the recent International Congress of Medicine in London, and it was the point driven home by another English student of repute in his recent animated controversy with Prof. C. B. Davenport, who probably stands at the head of investigators in this country. The cry to-day is for caution.

The difficulty is not one of ascertaining the end towards which the laws of heredity should be directed—always a tremendous objection to the "stock-farm" argument. We simply do not know enough about the laws of heredity. Theory is outrunning fact. This would seem to be admitted even by those who have lost no time in advocating the application of eugenic principles to life. Professor Davenport has admitted that his recent pronouncement concerning the mating of strength with weakness, for which he was so violently assailed by an English critic, was dictated, in the last resort, not by strictly scientific considerations but by common-sense.

And common-sense is always bound to make itself heard under such circumstances. Common-sense has no authority in the field of pure science where discoveries frequently consist in establishing the truth of things that the ordinary sense of men has declared impossible. But once the principles of science are brought into touch with life, the corrective and inhibiting influence of common-sense must enter. It is then, when we are facing a practical problem, that we so often find that the latest teachings of science have been anticipated by the ordinary experiences of mankind. Those few principles of eugenics which we are to-day bound to recognize have been recognized, and applied, for ages. Eugenics is embodied in the laws and regulations of marriage obtaining among all peoples, and all creeds and legal systems. The prohibition of marriage within certain degrees of kinship is largely based on eugenic principles, consciously or unconsciously. The Catholic Church, in forbidding the marriage of cousins, is more thoroughly eugenic than some of our cautious eugenists are inclined to be to-day. Science renders immense service by giving definite expression to, and supplying a conscious basis for, practices that men have developed in the harsh experience of the ages. And this long continuity of human experience must always remain as one of the tests for legislation dealing with the intimacies of life.

Common-sense, as applied to this question of eugenics, denotes something far different from a Gradgrind philosophy of hard facts and strictly prudential considerations. Common-sense connotes sentiment, poesy, and the higher human instincts when it upholds the sanctity of life, of love, and of human purpose against the stock-farm interpreters of eugenism. Common-sense is much more philosophical than the mass of pseudo-scientific eugenists when it refuses to fix its attention upon an isolated problem to the overlooking of counter-problems. Common-sense refuses to grow excited over the necessity of preventing the "degeneration" of the race because it recognizes that no such process is under way; because it recognizes that the health of the race is improving, that the span of human life is increasing, and that a greater proportion of the race is tasting a greater share of happiness than ever before. Common-sense is aware, for instance, that discoveries are constantly and continually made in the field of medicine which at one stroke do more for the health and well-being of the race than the eugenists could hope to attain through ages of painful effort.

In general, common-sense recognizes that, as compared with the difficult and uncertain business of improving the race by regulating birth, a vastly greater amount of good can be accomplished by concentrating upon the human material after birth. To drop into scientific vernacular, common-sense opposes the well-proven influence of environment to the still dubious functioning of heredity. It recognizes that poverty, alcoholism, and crime are not prenatally determined, but are the product largely of social conditions. It was Prof. Karl Pearson, the most distinguished of Galton's followers, who conducted an investigation some years ago into the effects of alcoholism upon the young, and found that the children of alcoholic parents are not noticeably inferior in health to the children of sober parents. The eugenists are appalled by the birth-rate in the English slums, and foresee the swamping of the fit of the nation by the unfit. But common-sense ventures to doubt whether the English lower classes have ever been better off than they are to-day, and asks to what extent a rapidly growing population has been justified by the peopling of the waste places of the earth and the upbuilding of an empire with its millions of prosperous colonists.

It is not a simple problem. Every broad assertion made in behalf of common-sense immediately calls for its reservations and exceptions. The ideal of a healthier race towards which the eugenist strives cannot wisely be put aside by any man of sense. Nor can certain contentions of the eugenist be dismissed, such as the demand for the regulation of marriage among the notoriously diseased or otherwise obviously unfit. But the great objection is that, passing from what is absolutely justified, the eugenists, on the basis of principles whose validity is by no means established, have been clamoring for a short and easy way with problems of the utmost concern for the future of the race.

MEXICANIZING ENGLAND.

If we may believe the dispatches, the British Isles will soon be filled with rival armies. In Ulster fifty or sixty thousand men are drilling—with wooden guns. Not to be outdone by Belfast, Dublin has begun the recruiting of an "army." Ten thousand men enrolled the first day. They will presumably drill with shillelahs. But the thing does not stop there. The striking Transport Workers in Dublin are catching up the idea. They, too, say they will have their army, General Larkin will take the field against General Redmond, with General Carson perhaps moving against both from the North of Ireland. And at the same time the embattled ladies under General Drummond may be marching on Downing Street. It will soon be so that every political faction, even every clique, will have its "army." The Labor party and the trades unions are growing restless, with everybody else arming, and say that the time is drawing near when they also will cease to depend upon voting to get what they want, and will seize guns to extort it from the Government.

The whole thing, if we are to accept the reports as printed, has a Mexican air. Sir Edward Carson does not like what the Government proposes to do in Ireland, and so he issues his pronunciamiento in Belfast, just as if his first name were Eduardo and his last Orozco. John Redmond looks with dislike and envy upon this North of Ireland insurrection, and raises his "cry" in Dublin, after the fashion of "el grito de Hidalgo." Then there are the "plans" of Larkin and the suffragettes and the labor unions, put out with all the prolixity and the vehemence of a Comonfort or a Madero rushing to arms. An alarmed and too credulous observer might think that, by a year from now, Prime Minister Asquith will be in London like another Huerta in Mexico City, giving out bulletins about the operations against rebels in all parts of the United Kingdom.

In the very fact that all this sounds comic lies the best hope that a peaceful and sensible way out will be found. Englishmen, too, have an "ancient humor" which will save them at the last. The process of raising an "army" to enforce every local or factional demand will soon reduce itself to the absurd; and then the armies will disband amid a universal smile. Batteries of public ridicule will be opened on the fierce paper-warriors. This kind of firing has, indeed, already begun—it is probably the only firing that will be done—and it is as hard for public men to endure it in England as it is on the Boulevards of Paris. Several months must pass before any of the Irish armies will have any excuse for mobilizing, and when the time comes it will very likely be the old story over again of thousands of infuriated and determined patriots who would have risen had they not been prevented by the police.

That the entire matter has a deeply serious aspect, however, no one who stops to think will deny. Not without disquietude can those accustomed to associate England with ordered liberty read of these threats of violence and of civil war. English political methods have always been rough. The Chartist movement had its fringe of incendiarism and murder. What the Fenians did and attempted, it is not necessary to recount. The lawless outrages by the suffragists can plead many bad precedents. But those English agitators misread the history of their own country who think that anything is to be gained by terrorism. It was not the burning and killing threatened by the Chartists that won the workingmen the vote; nor was it the pulling down of the Hyde Park railings, so often cited mistakenly; but the long appeal to reason and justice made by the Quaker, John Bright, and those who fought by his side, using only weapons of warfare that were spiritual. This is the kind of peaceful triumph of an idea that we like to think of as characteristic of England; and every friend of hers is shocked and pained to read of this new incursion of rowdyism in English public life; every man proposing to do what is right in his own eyes, regardless of the law, and throwing away the ballot in order to grasp the bludgeon.

For these sporadic outbreaks of warlike talk and action, the example set by Ulster is no doubt largely responsible. Sir Edward Carson and his followers have much to answer for in cultivating the spirit of violent resistance to the law of the land. The thing could not be confined to their corner of Ireland. No sooner do the men of Belfast undertake to act upon Lord Randolph Churchill's fine gasconading cry, "Ulster will fight, and Ulster will be right," than the men of Dublin shout in response, "Leinster will fight, and Leinster will be right." To this kind of angry separatism has led a movement avowedly started in the name of the Empire! It is one of the huge absurdities of the notion of raising armies to get what you are too rash and impatient to seek to obtain by the slower methods of discussion and law-making. First evoked by professed Imperialists, the spirit of violence has speedily given us a Larkin, addressing great audiences in England and crying out, "Damn the Empire!"

COMBINING IN SOCIAL WORK.

Germany has lately shown the possibility of two institutions, one formed for the practical treatment of a social evil, the other for its theoretical study, existing in ignorance of each other, though by joining they could heighten their effectiveness. At the International Congress of Criminologists at Copenhagen last summer, emphasis was laid upon a proposal for a Kriminalistisches Reichsinstitut at Berlin. It was to study criminal psychology, sociology, and psychiatry; police methods, trial methods, and the Bertillon and other systems of identification; with prisons and penal systems in detail. In the course of discussion, however, so Professor von Liszt writes in Die Woche, Chief of Police Lindenau, of Berlin, and the representatives of the University of Berlin discovered that in two divided parts the Reichsinstitut already existed. One was the Polizei-Präsidium, with a special museum, a criminal laboratory, a system of graphic charts, and a collection of criminal archives. The other was a department of the University, a Kriminalistisches Seminar, enrolling large classes. No one doubted the value of a Royal Institute; but why spend thousands for one when by throwing open the doors between classroom and bureau a perfect substitute could be created?

This is an example of shortsightedness in sociological work. Of the necessity for coördinating schemes of social benevolence we hear much; some plans for central supervision of philanthropies have actually been put into operation. But they meet a need coming after that of combining efforts at the active treatment of a social evil with those for its theoretical study. Any positive maladjustment in society calls into being an agency to deal with it. Such agencies are remedial. Of another sort are those reform organizations which study social questions in a scientific spirit. The boundary line between the two is more and more broken down. But even in so complex and advanced a matter as criminology the division is still found, as the German criminologists discovered.

It is natural to demand that the reform agencies shall cover both grounds. The primary basis for this is not economy of effort and money; rather, it is the feeling that social schemes should be planned upon the broadest possible scale. The proposal for the Reichsinstitut is typical of this new requirement; it was to unite the effective with the theoretical, the permanent reform with the immediate remedy, the humanitarian with the philosophical. It is a partial estimate of the need for inclusiveness of scope which prompts to expand one or the other isolated agency, without an effort to bring the two together. The Berlin Polizei-Präsidium might have gone on enlarging its functions indefinitely, as might also the Seminar of the University; yet neither would have reached its full usefulness, since their constitutions forbade trenching on each other's field. But once the largest possible view is taken, a hundred agencies spring to their places in the plan. It is a frequent criticism of schemes of practical reform that they are wanting in breadth and in insight into the future. Theoretical studies are said to be remote, intangible, and academic. The winning forward of social movements is by eliminating the deficiencies of the two and joining their virtues.

In a recent issue of the Nineteenth Century, an article upon "Blundering Social Reform," by Sir Guilford L. Molesworth, gathers together a number of instances of costly errors on the part of institutions prominent in philanthropic work in the British Isles. The conclusion of the writer is that too often the eyes of England's legislators and social reformers are fixed either upon the ground at their feet, or upon nothing but the distant horizon. He quotes a sentence from Chateaubriand's "Memoirs": "There are two consequences in history: an immediate one, at once recognized; and one in the distance, which is not at first perceived. These consequences often contradict each other." His conclusion is that, while the breach between the practical and the theoretical schools of social reformers is often bridged, the very complexities of modern reform keep the necessity for eternal vigilance always present. And he tries to show in England to-day the necessity for that broadness of purpose which, in Herbert Spencer's phrase, holds in mind not merely "the immediate object to be achieved, but the indirect and far-off result."

BARBARA FRIETCHIE AND FAME.

The story of Barbara Frietchie is again under fire. Whittier's account of the supposed incident of September 13, 1862, is felt as an aspersion upon the Confederate troops, and so testimony is offered concerning the affair that would delight the heart of a district attorney. Why any one should be offended by the tale is not evident. "Who touches a hair of yon gray head," Stonewall Jackson is represented as exclaiming, "dies like a dog. March on!" Surely this is true Southern chivalry. But it does not satisfy the critics in the Southland, and they remind us accordingly, not simply that the story is false, but that it has been proved so by the mouths and the pens of several persons who ought to know. Here is a letter written from Frederick City only nine years after the war by Valerius Ebert, nephew of Barbara and administrator of her husband's estate, setting forth that Jackson and his troops did not pass nearer the Frietchie residence than three hundred yards, that they were never on the same street as the house, and that the lady herself, being ninety-six years old, was bedridden, and so far from being able to clamber to the attic window that she could not even get upon her feet without assistance. Finally, Whittier himself is said to have acknowledged that he had been misled and to have expressed his regret over the occurrence.

If this is not enough to demolish the myth, there is a later version, come fresh from Frederick City, which tears it to shreds. Two of Jackson's men, so this rendering goes, having entered the Frietchie house to take down the offending flag, Dame Frietchie chased them back into the street with a broom. It is possible that in this form the tale will be no more palatable to its critics than it is in the orthodox version, but when you set out to dispose of a myth, you cannot object to others who are engaged in the same laudable endeavor. But those who resent the story as Whittier told it do not stop with destructive criticism; they attempt to put it entirely out of the way by showing its probable origin. To Col. Kyd Douglas of Jackson's staff belongs the credit for the following narrative:

> Two very pretty girls, with ribbons of red, white, and blue floating from their hair, small Union flags in their hands, rushed out of a house as we passed, came to the curbstone, and with much laughter waved their flags defiantly in the face of the General. He bowed, raised his hat, and turning with his quiet smile to the staff, said, "We evidently have no friends in this town."

"Doubtless," comments the Charlotte, N. C., Observer, "girls or women who were Union sympathizers waved Union flags at Confederate invaders in the border States or the Union States beyond." But as for anything such as is related in connection with Barbara Frietchie, perish the thought!

Why should one have a grudge against myths? Well, the truth is that very few persons are so enamoured of fact as to wish to war against myths. All that most of us care to do is to crush a particular myth that offends us. Some of the leading critics of this Barbara Frietchie tale, for instance, become stanch supporters of a myth, or at least of an extremely doubtful story, when any one ventures to wonder about the Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence. The shoe is then on the other foot. All the evidence tending to establish the fact of such a Declaration is greeted as entitled to respect. Any one contemplating an attack upon a myth of any standing would do well, therefore, to begin doubtfully and far away. If you have reason to suspect the authenticity of the Boston Tea Party, commence your war upon it in Nevada or Arizona. Point out the considerations that incline Bostonians to cling to any tale that does honor to Revolutionary traditions of this kind. Pour scorn upon the narrowness of the spirit that prefers local glory to the pure and unadulterated truth. Your Nevada or Arizona audience, not being especially concerned in the issue, will agree with you heartily, and in time you may create a sentiment regarding the famous Party that will put Boston decidedly on the defensive.

If one looks at the story of Barbara Frietchie in cold blood, one fails to see why the exact truth about it should greatly matter. Prove it to be false, and what have you achieved except to deprive a picturesque figure of its halo? But we do not look at myths in cold blood. If we could, we should not care for them. When we read about Barbara, we are not a jury in the box, making up our minds about the relative weight of evidence in the case of Jackson vs. Frietchie. Not at all. We are up there in the attic window with the intrepid old woman. More than that; it is our hands that seize the flag as it falls from its shattered staff. It is our hands that wave it defiantly before the advancing guns, our voice that shouts the challenge that may mean its silencing forever, and our victory for a cause that is dearer to us than life. We value myths, not for their truth to history, but for the tribute they pay to the possibilities of human nature. We cling to them, not because their destruction would deprive us of our ideas of the past, but because it would strike a blow at our faith in ourselves.

CHARLES ELIOT NORTON.

One of the mottoes prefixed to the second volume of these letters* is a sentence from Sainte-Beuve, which would read in English something like this: "The illustrious writers, the great poets, scarcely exist without having about them other men, themselves essential rather than secondary, great in their incompleteness, the equals in the inner life of thought with those whom they love, whom they serve, and who are kings by right of art." The words could not be more fitting if they had been written with Norton in mind, so perfectly do they express his relation to the artists of his generation. We think of him first, perhaps, as the friend of Ruskin and Carlyle, of Longfellow and Lowell, and of the other writers who were giving lustre to the Victorian and —may we say?—Cantabrigian age, and we recall the epitaph he once playfully suggested for himself: "He had good friends, whom he loved"; but we do his memory wrong if we regard him merely as parasite, or shadow, of those greater reputations. He was more than friend and audience; he was counsellor and, at times, judge. One of the few notes of personal resentment in his correspondence is a protest against a passage in Ruskin's "Præterita" which had represented him as seeking unasked the society of the more famous man. Ruskin, indeed, meant to cast no slur, and in the same book adds the most generous praise of his "first tutor": "Norton saw all my weaknesses, measured all my narrownesses, and, from the first, took serenely, and as it seemed of necessity, a kind of paternal authority over me, and a right of guidance—though the younger of the two—and always admitting my full power in its own kind."

Something of that "rectorial power" he had with whomsoever he lived, whether individual or community, and from it came his honor and a measure, too, of bitter reproach. His letters, as they are now published in selection, have other claims to attention, but their greatest value is in the clear revelation of the man himself to those who knew him not at all or, like the writer of this essay, knew him but slightly, and of the source of the authority which made him among his more productive contemporaries an égal au dedans. The opportunity to set forth the nature of that power brings a peculiar pleasure, not without a sense also of humility, to the present editor of the journal which Norton helped to found and into which so much of his character entered.

I.

As for the work of the editors of these volumes it is sufficient to say that there is not a word of their own about Norton, nor is there a letter of his included, which would have given offence to his scrupulous taste in such matters; and, on the other hand, there is no evidence that anything has been omitted which is necessary to the understanding of the man and his position. Possibly the interest of the volumes would not have been diminished if an even stricter selection had been exercised in the earlier letters. He came to maturity late, and it is the gravity of his judgment more than any adventitious aids of fancy or cleverness that holds our attention.

His letters in this respect are curiously unlike those of Lowell, with which one naturally compares them. After the first crude effervescence of youth Lowell charms us with his grace and keeps us almost spellbound with the fecundity of his wit; we say that never was there a fellow like this to amuse and entertain. But somehow the interest does not quite hold to the end; we are a little irked to find that he never entirely controlled his own faculties; we never touch bottom with him, not so much because of the depth of his mind as because of the drift of its currents. With Norton it is just the reverse. We begin by thinking him, comparatively at least, a trifle dull; but as we read on we are caught by the sheer integrity of his utterance; we are impressed by the feeling that here was a man of utter veracity, who never swerved aside to be funny or wise or profound or original, but was concerned to say with unflinching precision just what he felt and thought. No doubt these virtues are in a way negative and denote a certain slowness of imagination and a certain lack of higher spontaneity in the writer, but at the worst we are not annoyed by the attempt to conceal such deficiencies under a sham sprightliness, and at the best we forget them by reason of other positive qualities. There is nothing in this correspondence in any way equivalent to the winged phrases in which Lowell describes to Norton the effect of Emerson's Phi Beta Kappa oration: "It began nowhere and ended everywhere, and yet, as always with that divine man, it left you feeling that something beautiful had passed that way—something more beautiful than anything else, like the rising and setting of stars," etc. Nor was it within the compass of Norton's pen to write any one of a dozen of those improvisations in which Lowell fairly takes your breath away with the audacity of his wit. But neither was it within the scope of Lowell's intelligence to give finality to one of the commonplaces of experience with just such grave and pondered beauty of expression as that which Norton used to Leslie Stephen on the death of his brother: "It is one of those changes which alter the whole habit and aspect of life—shutting up so many chambers to which nobody else has a key, increasing the solitary and silent part of life which grows so disproportionate to the rest as we grow old." In the end we suspect that most readers will say, as they close the second of these volumes: Here is the larger man and the deeper nature, and here, after all deductions, are the finer letters.

But it must not be supposed that Norton was pedantic or priggish in his correspondence, or sent out an epistle with the solemn consideration of a judge handing down a decision. He is familiar and easy enough on occasion, and at times strong and picturesque. Especially during and after his third long visit abroad his letters and journal gain in liveliness by the occasional portraits of men and reports of conversations. Naturally, Carlyle is prominent in these, and he is presented as abounding in the kind of humorous exaggeration by virtue of which Norton always defended him against his detractors. One day it is Carlyle discoursing on Browning:

> So he went on till some one asked him if he had seen Browning lately. "Na," said he, with a twinkle in his eye, "but I've read the whole of his new poem, 'The Ring and the Book,' in four volumes, from beginning to end, without omitting a word, and a most extraordinary production it is—a work of great ingenuity and full of verra strikin' sentences. I met Browning, indeed, in Piccadilly the other day, and I told him I'd read his poem from the first word thereof way to the last, and he said to me, quickly, 'Well! Well?' and I replied that I thought it a book of prodigious talent and unparalleled ingenuity; but then, I suppose trusting to the sincerity of my own thoughts, I went on to say that of all the strange books produced on this distracted airth, by any of the sons of Adam, this one was altogether the strangest and the most preposterous in its construction; and where, said I, do ye think to find the eternal harmonies in it? Browning did not seem to be pleased with my speech, and he bade me good morning."

At another time it is Carlyle's swift judgment of Sumner, whom he defines as "the most completely nothin' of a mon that ever crossed my threshold—naught whatsoever in him or of him but wind and vanity." And again it is Carlyle on Carlyle, expressing a fundamental truth about himself which some of his critics have still to learn:

> While we were sitting by the fireside, before we left the house this afternoon, he said, speaking of himself,—"I've been much misunderstood in my time, and very lately now I was readin' an article on Froude's view of Ireland in the last number of Macmillan, written by a man whom ye may have seen, one——, a willow pattern of a man, very shrill and voluble, but harmless, a pure herbivorous, nay, graminivorous creature, and he says with many terms of compliment that there's 'a great and venerable author' who's done infinite harm to the world by preachin' the gospel that Might makes Right, which is the verra precise contrary to the truth I hold and have endeavored to set forth, which is simply that Right makes Might. And I well remember when, in my younger days, the force o' this truth first dawned on me, it was a sort of Theodicee to me, a clew to many facts to which I have held on from that day."

II.

But it is Norton himself we come to seek in this correspondence, rather than Carlyle or another, and Norton's place as the last representative of a remarkable generation—ultimus Novorum Anglicanorum. Some day we shall appreciate New England literature at its true value. But before that day we must learn to distinguish between what is provincial and what is merely local. If anything is provincial it is to incorporate such men as the old Scottish poets in the main body of English literature, as is commonly done in manuals of the subject, and to relegate the Massachusetts writers to an appendix, if they are mentioned at all, as though they were foreign to the spirit of the language in which they wrote. In one of his letters from London, Lowell tells of a Scotsman who "had the ill-manners" to compliment him on his English: "Why, I shouldn't know you weren't an Englishman. Where did you get it?" Lowell's was the reproof valiant. "I couldn't resist," he says, "and answered with a couple of verses from a Scottish ballad—

> I got it in my mither's wame,
> Whaur ye'll get never the like!

He will never compliment me again, I fear." Whatever justification there may be for separating off the New England group lies rather in their cosmopolitanism. It is true that they showed symptoms of a weakening at the root by their too ready submission to influences from Germany and Spain and Italy, but in the main they were faithful inheritors of one of the dominant British traditions. Through all the changes that inevitably came with the passage of two hundred years, they still remembered the voice of Bunyan and Baxter and Marvell and Herbert and Wither and the others to whom their fathers had hearkened at the time of the great exodus. They created no one piece quite of the first rank in the realm of the imagination, but the body of their work, when the final account is made, will stand out honorably in the general production of the Victorian era, and the spirit which controlled them and which rises from their books as a kind of fine and fragrant exhalation, will be recognized as one of the very precious things in the history of the world.

And Norton himself was fully aware of the beauty and meaning of that tradition into which he was born. No doubt, in the course of his long life he said many hard things about America, speaking sometimes not altogether wisely. Like others of his generation, he was caught up by the enthusiasm of the years when the country was moved to its depths by a passionate idea, and had it not been for ill health he would have fought in the Civil War with the soldiers of his State. But after the war he was never in sympathy with certain marked tendencies of democracy and never hesitated to express his opinion. "I have been too much of an idealist about America," he wrote, near the end of his life, "had set my hopes too high, had formed too fair an image of what she might become. Never had nation such an opportunity, she was the hope of the world." This disillusion was in part due to his fastidious social sense, sharpened by the contrast of America with the large opportunities he had enjoyed. Society was to him "the very rarest and best thing that the world proper can give us. It is the thing that our modern materialism is largely killing out—that is, in its highest form, the society that bears witness to leisure and culture, and good breeding, made up of men who, though versed in affairs, are still idealists and lovers of poetry." This was the idea he had in mind, no doubt, when he began a lecture on the word "gentleman" before a large class with the grave pleasantry: "None of you, probably, has ever seen a gentleman." Such sentiments and words were not always taken kindly, and when, as at the time of the Spanish War, he did not hesitate to expose publicly the mixture of hypocrisy and thoughtlessness that entered into the popular furor, resentment against him became almost a mark of loyalty to the country. Opinions may still vary in regard to his tilt with Senator Hoar; there are those who still think he was rightly rebuked for "the habit of bitter and sneering speech"; but these, we may suspect, are not many. Reading the letters of Norton and Senator Hoar side by side, most of us to-day will feel that honor and truth are rather on the side of Norton, and his address to the Cambridge Club, which, in a garbled report, called forth the storm of reproach, will seem to-day the memorable utterance of a calm and virile patriotism. Nor should it be forgotten that the address ended with the strong words, "Nil desperandum de republica." Norton himself did, in fact, never despair. Many times in his letters he expresses his faith in the essential soundness of the people, and as he grew older his confidence in the destiny of his country increased rather than diminished. It is notable that the architecture of the World's Fair at Chicago was to him a magnificent achievement and a greater promise, and that from the city itself he could draw happy auguries for the future of America. A Brahmin of New England who can admire Chicago is not quite lost to virtue.

III.

But withal, whether for his credit or discredit, it must be admitted that Norton stood before the country and exercised the office of critic as the product of a particular time and place. He was of Cambridge, the earlier Cambridge which was, with Concord, one of the eyes of New England, the Greece of Greece, so to speak; and this position he never forgot. Again and again in his letters he refers to the exceptional character of the generation in which his own life began. "I believe, indeed," he says once, writing at the end of the century, "that the very pleasantest little oasis of space and time was that of New England from about the beginning of the century to about 1825 [he himself was born in 1827]. The spirit of that time was embodied in Emerson, in Longfellow, in Holmes, and in Lowell. It was an inexperienced and youthful spirit, but it was a happy one; it had the charm of youth, its hope, its simplicity, its sweetness." He might have added, as his reader no doubt added, that he, too, was one of the bearers of that spirit —sacra fero ingenti percussus amore— though, for the hopefulness of youth, he brought other qualities. Innumerable forces of inheritance made him what he was. His ancestor, John Norton, named for his more noted uncle, one of the four famous Johns (Cotton, Norton, Wilson, and Davenport), took charge of the parish of Hingham in 1678. In the same year he published a poem, being nothing other than a "Funeral Elogy, Upon that Patron of Virtue, the truly pious, peerless & matchless Gentlewoman, Mrs. Anne Bradstreet." In 1897 our Norton edited the poems of the matchless gentlewoman, and in his introduction wrote of her with more than his usual freedom and intimacy:

> It struck me that there would be something of quaint appropriateness in my writing, at this long interval, in regard to her whose praises he [John Norton] had sung, and that the act would not be without a certain piety toward my ancestor. And, further, I reflected, that as I could trace my descent in one line directly from Gov. Thomas Dudley, the father of Mrs. Bradstreet, and as portraits of her brother, Gov. Joseph Dudley, and his wife, looked down on me every day while I sat at breakfast and dinner, she, as my Aunt many times removed, might not unjustly have a claim upon me for such token of respect to her memory as had been asked of me. . . . She cherished in herself and in her children the things of the mind and of the spirit; and if such memory as her verses have secured for her depend rather on the circumstance of a woman's writing them at the time when she did, and in the place where she lived, than upon their poetic worth, it is a memory honorable to her, and it happily preserves the name of a good woman, among whose descendants has been more than one poet whose verses reflect lustre on her own. (Through one of her children she is the ancestress of Richard Henry Dana; through another, of Oliver Wendell Holmes.)

From a daughter of John Norton, married to John Quincy, were descended John Adams and John Quincy Adams. In the direct male line came Andrews Norton, who in 1811 was appointed a tutor at Harvard and later professor of sacred literature. In 1821 he married Catharine Eliot (whence the relationship with President Eliot), and soon bought the house with some fifty acres of land in Cambridge known as Shady Hill. In that quiet home, which was to welcome so many of the great scholars and writers of the world, and whose gracious courtesies and dignity so many Harvard men still cherish in memory as a possession equal in value to any learning,* Charles Eliot Norton, one of four children who grew to maturity, was born, and there, after many years and many labors, laid down his life.

By every right of tradition Norton belonged with the group of scholars and poets who just preceded him in birth, and he belonged with them also by virtue of his own accomplishments. When we consider the work of that generation it seems as if we saw the energy of a strong people, nourished through long discipline and austere abstentions, now suddenly freed from repression and displaying itself in manifold, and all too brief, expansion. Each man had his particular share in that activity: to one it was the exercise of wit, to another the sentiment of home and hearth, to another the comfort of religion, to another the recreation of the past, to another the critical judgment, to another the symbolism of a brooding imagination, to another the freedom of nature, to another the justification of the untrammelled spirit. Now it must be admitted that in none of these fields was Norton quite eminent; even as a critic his writing falls below Whipple's, who was nevertheless in every way a smaller man than he. It is not unlikely that the melancholy which shows itself occasionally in his letters was in some small measure due to the consciousness of these deficiencies. So he writes one day to Lowell: "Except for George, I have been very solitary. From year to year I seem to myself to grow more and more silent, and to express less of what is in my soul. I should like to have the power of expression—at least long enough to give form and utterance to a few of the deeper conceptions of Life and its significance and uses which come to one as one grows old and draws the lessons from his own experience." It is true, as he says, that he never embodied his wisdom of experience in literary form, but this wisdom is precisely what he stood for among his contemporaries, and just because we feel this in his letters we shall treasure them. He was, in the deepest sense of the word, the man of culture, the ripe scholar, to whom the lessons of the past had become a personal experience. To the multiform flowering of the time he brought the true cosmopolitanism.

But he brought also with that culture, and this was his finest gift, a peculiar virtue of inheritance. More than any other man of his group, he represented the naked New England conscience and its tenacity of character. It may seem that his powers were manifested chiefly in negation. To the individual, and particularly to the young student who showed promise of achievement, he could be generous of help and encouragement. But in relation to the community at large he stood undeniably as critic and check; and this attitude was often deeply resented. What has this man done, people would ask in a tone of cavilling rebellion, that he should set himself up as judge over others? Well, the question was not unnatural; yet is not character always in some way negative? Is it not of its very essence to act as a check upon the impulsive temperament, and even upon the ranging enthusiasms of the soul? And especially in the hour of expansive liberty that came to New England when it had broken from the bondage of religion, it was desirable that the principal of restraint, broadened indeed by contact with the world, but not weakened or clouded, should have had its voice and embodiment. On the ship which brought Norton home from Europe in May of 1873 Emerson also sailed, and we have in Norton's journal a record of his wonderful conversation, with the journalist's comment and criticism. For one who reflects on the later course of New England and America these are memorable pages:

> Emerson was the greatest talker in the ship's company. He talked with all men, and yet was fresh and zealous for talk at night. His serene sweetness, the pure whiteness of his soul, the reflection of his soul in his face, were never more apparent to me; but never before in intercourse with him had I been so impressed with the limits of his mind. His optimistic philosophy has hardened into a creed, with the usual effects of a creed in closing the avenues of truth. . . . He refuses to believe in disorder or evil. Order is the absolute law; disorder is but a phenomenon. . . .
> But such inveterate and persistent optimism, though it may show only its pleasant side in such a character as Emerson's, is dangerous doctrine for a people. It degenerates into fatalistic indifference to moral considerations and to personal responsibilities; it is the root of much of the irrational sentimentalism in our American politics. . . .

Never were truer words put on paper. The pure whiteness of Emerson's soul is, when all has been reckoned up, the finest thing that New England has given to the world; but in the society for which he ministered as a high priest of ecstatic vision, there was a place also, an indispensable place, for the questioner who stood for the traditional New England conscience and sense of evil. We shall do well to honor Norton in our memory as one who through all spiritual temptations kept his feet firmly planted on the bedrock of character.

The winds of folly blew about him as they blow about us, the dust of pedantries smote his eyes, cant and sentimentalism fouled his air, but he held to his course unmoved, cherishing always in his heart what is lovely and of good report, a faithful teacher, to whom were well applied the words of the poet who had been the chief study of his life:

> Felice te, che si parli a tua posta.

NEWS FOR BIBLIOPHILES.

An additional note on the political features of the Washington Benevolent Society (see the Bibliophile in the Nation, October 30), from the Democratic point of view, may be of interest. The Democrats always regarded the social and benevolent work of the society as subordinate to its political activity. When the Providence branch was organized in 1810, the Rhode Island Republican denounced its members as "wolves in sheep's clothing," their real object being to prevent the execution of Congressional commercial laws, and to neutralize the power of the Democratic Tammany Society in elections. The outbreak of war with England in 1812 was accompanied by great activity on the part of the Federalists. The New Hampshire Patriot on January 12, 1813, declares:

> The Washington Benevolent Societies are extending in every direction. They fan to a big flame the spirit of party animosity, and succeed in marshalling and preparing to act on all occasions, each individual of their party.

The fact that the New England States were under Federalist control during the war was widely attributed to the efforts of this organization. Democratic hostility towards it was intense. Resolutions of conventions at Windham and Woodstock, Vt., declared the societies too friendly to England, "guilty of treason and rebellion," and "dangerous by reason of their numbers, extent, and secrecy." In Berkshire, Mass., similar resolutions warned them to beware of "the vengeance of an indignant people." Throughout the war, smuggling, trading with the enemy, obstruction of recruiting, and even spying, were offences commonly charged against the societies. In short, the tone of the Democrats resembles that which the Republicans maintained towards the Knights of the Golden Circle half a century later. The files of Isaac Hills's New Hampshire Patriot contain much interesting material on this subject. A very witty satire on the society is, "The Book of the Washington Benevolents; otherwise called the Book of the Knaves," published in Boston in 1813. There is a copy of this pamphlet in the collection of the American Antiquarian Society.

WIDENING THE LEGAL VISION.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The Columbia Law Review for November contains an article entitled "The Future of the Common Law," by Robert Ludlow Fowler, Surrogate of New York County. The article can be interpreted in only one way. It is a veiled attack on a notable and systematic effort now being made to widen the legal vision of American judges, practitioners, educators, and students, by encouraging a study of contemporary jurisprudence as it exists on the Continent of Europe. Among the leaders of this notable and systematic effort—so displeasing to the Surrogate of New York County—are Mr. Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes; John B. Winslow, Chief Justice of Wisconsin; Prof. John H. Wigmore, of the Northwestern University Law School; Prof. Roscoe Pound, of the Harvard Law School; Rapelje Howell, Esq., of the New York bar, and Edward Lindsay, Esq., of the Pennsylvania bar. Three learned societies which have done much to foster this notable and systematic effort are the American Bar Association, the Association of American Law Schools, and the American Institute of Criminal Law and Criminology. The last two organizations are now engaged in translating, editing, and publishing no fewer than thirty-three volumes of modern legal literature by European authors.

The article in question contains a number of amusing errors. One of them is seen in this sentence: "It was the Italian Mazzini and the Central European Democracy of 1849 who first employed the term 'Progressives' and came out for the 'Progress of Humanity'" (p. 604). Like so many judges in New York, the Surrogate is evidently more interested in politics than in jurisprudence. If he knew the a-b-c of comparative jurisprudence, which he condemns so glibly, he would know that long before 1849 the adjective "progressive" was used interchangeably with "historical," to indicate a method of studying law and social science. Anybody can verify this by glancing over chapter x of Book VI of the first edition of John Stuart Mill's "Logic," published in 1843. TYRRELL WILLIAMS.

DIALECT VERSES AND COLLEGE FLUMMERY.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The letters upon these topics in your issue of November 13 interested me much, and I hope that others among your readers will continue the discussion more fully than I can at present. Of course, in both cases there is involved the question of taste; I hold that one of the functions of the Nation is to improve our standards rather than to follow or even condone the fashions of the day, too often set by the ignorant or thoughtless.

That which may be at first piquant may become by repetition wearisome and even odious. Dogberry, Mrs. Malaprop, Natty Bumpo, and the Yankee of the "Biglow Papers" had the merit of novelty; virtually they were original creations. Similar place may be accorded to the earlier verse of the Hoosier type. But no such claim can be made for their imitations, through all grades, down to the ineffable vulgarities of the legends of the "comic" pictures in some contemporary newspapers, based upon what one may imagine to be the language of the slums.

So, too, "Old Folks at Home," "Old Uncle Ned," and "Mighty Lak a Rose" were new departures; but words fail to characterize their degenerate imitations, the "coon songs" that flood the music shops and are tolerated by persons otherwise apparently refined.

The writer of the letter on "Deans" refers to an article of some years ago on "The Flummery of Caps and Gowns," which I wish had been known to me before publishing the letter, "Is the Academic Costume Worth While?" in Science for January 31 last. Those who still try to persuade themselves that scholarly dignity is enhanced by gaudy garments are sympathetically referred to the costumes of the Philippine Bukidnons in the current number of the National Geographic Magazine.

FROM SCHOLARS TO UNDERGRADUATES.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Habits of speech doubtless follow facts of life and are significant of them. It is worthy of notice, then, that those who formerly attended our colleges were called "scholars." A specialization and intensification of the meaning of that word led to a shift in usage. They became "students," merely scholars in the making. Now, since they so frequently do not study at all, the word "students" in its turn is dropping out of use. Members of faculties everywhere show a growing tendency to speak of the mass as "undergraduates," a non-committal term, and of portions of the whole as "members of the class of 1913," or "members of Mathematics III," and so on.

In the old days the "female sex" in college was referred to as "young ladies." Now they are openly called by their elders "girls," and in private conversation "children."

Can speech affect fact? By persistent use of "scholars" (to go to the extreme) and "young ladies," can we change at all the trend of things? At least this is true: in general people try to live up to what is expected of them, good or bad, and when the teaching force of a college proclaims its discouragement and frankly expects no serious work of its "undergraduates," even by so doing it lessens its chance of getting serious work. THE CAFETERIA.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Let me answer briefly the query in regard to "Cafetaria" presented by Mr. Hart in his letter of November 12. The form cafeteria is the only one recognized in Los Angeles, where this type of dining place took its rise above seven years ago. Although the word chosen by its originator, a lady who has left this form of business and is now conducting a hotel, might be Italian, yet our proximity to Mexico, where Spanish is spoken, favors a Mexican origin; and this is the case. The accent on the penultimate is still imperative here, where the cafeteria has become an established institution.

The original cafeteria was opened at the northeast corner of Hill and Fourth Streets in the winter of 1906-7, and was soon a popular resort. Next year, in the block just south on Hill Street, an unpretentious cafeteria was opened by two business men, who conducted it with such success that they have now two large houses across the street, where excellent music is served by a string band. Los Angeles is, indeed, a city of cafeterias, so much so that a Senator from the northern part of the State facetiously proposed last year that, if the southern part should set up for itself, it might adopt the name "Southern Cafeteria." And a complaint was made that in the census she returned last year the city gave no list of the number of her cafeterias.

The first cafeteria was soon distanced, its management being slow to adopt music and other improvements. It reorganized itself two years ago as the "Original Cafeteria," and is now known as the "American Cafeteria." There is a busy cafeteria at the University of Southern California, which has been open for several years; others are to be found at the Young Men's Christian Association and elsewhere. So much for our local form of restaurant; it has never been so popular at San Francisco. JAMES MAIN DIXON.

A REMEDY FOR INSOMNIA.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I venture to speak in your columns of a remedy for sleeplessness which I have found useful, after vainly trying the various methods that are so often resorted to in the hope of coaxing sleep, such as fixing the attention upon a single subject or upon any one object in the room, counting, imagining a waving field, or the heaving sea, etc. It is not easy to describe what is mainly a negative process, but, roughly speaking, I try what I call to unthink. I shut out, as it were, any image or thought that obtrudes upon the blankness of the mind, and keep before me only the consciousness that all is blank and dark. In my case this expedient works well, and perhaps it may also benefit others. Whether it has the merit of objective originality I do not know. X.

Literature

HOLIDAY BOOKS.—I.

Travel is well represented this year among the more festive publications. Thus "Eöthen" ($3.50 net) comes from Lippincotts with illustrations by Frank Brangwyn, some of these ornaments for chapter-heads, others full-page color plates pasted in. No travel book out of the Orient, published since 1844, has equalled Kinglake's for color and humanity and persuasive veracity, and Mr. Brangwyn has not been disloyal to the spirit of his author. Also of the Orient, and suited to the writer's sense of color and form, and to his powers of varied description, is Pierre Loti's "India"; of which George Inman's translation is of recognized quality. As issued in Duffield's new edition ($2.50 net), the book is finely bound and printed, and a score of illustrations are added from the hand of A. Hugh Fisher, A.R.E. To these last only a qualified commendation can be allowed. Of the frontispiece, from a colored painting in oils, we shall not speak; but the other illustrations are mere outline sketches, rough and hazy to the destruction of vividness. In the case of another Oriental work, Robert Hichens's "The Near East: Dalmatia, Greece, and Constantinople" (Century; $6 net), with paintings in color by Jules Guérin, author, illustrator, and publisher have joined to make a notable gift-book. To readers familiar with text and pictures as they have appeared serially in the Century, the arresting feature of the volume will be its cover, of Byzantine design, in gold and rich colorings; but the heavy paper, the large, clear type, and the plates upon which the illustrations are printed all deserve praise. Mr. Hichens's descriptions are of the most freshness in Turkey, which seems to have appealed chiefly to him; and the same country has wrought with best effect upon the artist.

From the "Arabian Nights" we have the "Princess Radoura" (Doran; $3 net), retold by Laurence Housman in vigorous English, which, while not absolutely disdaining archaic phrases, gets along with a small number of them. The illustrations, however, supply the necessary atmosphere. Edmund Dulac knows how to represent a scene and to furnish a decoration at the same time. His pictures tell a story clearly, as if that were their one aim, and yet from central figure to decorative border there is a wealth of color and design. The present series of illustrations is a worthy addition to the notable list that he has to his credit.

Turning from the East to the West, we have Walter Tyndale's "Artist in Italy" (Doran; $5 net). When the narrator of a journey paints his own pictures of it, there is not likely to be any of that discrepancy too often felt between text and illustration. This harmony of conception is, however, the least of the merits of Mr. Tyndale's work. The places to be depicted, although limited to Venice and the hill towns of Tuscany, are selected with good judgment, and painted with happy skill. The bright colors of the market-places alternate with the quieter hues of town walls and the varying effects of sunlight upon sea and shore.

A new joyous edition of "Lorna Doone" is as fixed an event as Christmas itself. This year Crowell brings out the novel with sixteen illustrations in color by Christopher Clark ($2.50 net). Although the pages are large, the volume is light. The lover of this romance will be gratified to see how faithfully the illustrator has followed the text, while allowing his imagination full play.

Other new novels in holiday dress are not lacking. A clean specimen of these, with colored pictures, but with the look of a thing to be handled and read, is Hardy's "Under the Greenwood Tree" (Putnam; $2 net). A still more attractive volume from the same house is "Tom Brown's School Days" ($3 net), which might be ranged among the children's books if children can be of all ages. Views of Rugby, inside and out, will make the story more vivid for American readers who are not familiar with the English school. Thackeray is represented by an edition of "Vanity Fair" (Doran; $5 net), on which great care has been expended by artist and publisher. In case of so live a character as Becky Sharp, who forms the centre of most of the illustrations, opinions will always differ as to how she outwardly appeared at the crucial moments of her career. Yet it may be said for Lewis Baumer's pictures that they are always interesting, dainty, and piquant, and his colors are pretty without being garish.

To the four of Thoreau's books which the Crowell Company has already published with illustrations by Clifton Johnson, is now added "Excursions" ($2 net). Those familiar with Mr. Johnson's work will not need to have the many careful photographs in the present volume recommended to them. All are taken in or about Concord; and vary from snapshots of The Farmer with his Scythe and The Woodchopper's Dinner, to such bits of pure nature as The Snowy Woodland and Moonlight on Lancaster Meadow. For the most part they chime admirably with the text. Only now and then the line of a trolley down a country road, or the gleam of telephone wires across a shady landscape, reminds us of the distance from our day of the author of "Wild Apples," "A Walk to Wachusetts," and "The Succession of Forest Trees." Emerson's biographical sketch is printed as an introduction, and the book is bound in appropriate russet and green. The transition from Thoreau to Richard Jefferies is a transition from natural Nature to hectic Nature. And not the least hectic of Jefferies's books, though with an interest of its own, is the intensely subjective "Story of My Heart." E. W. Waite's pictures for this book, in Dutton's new edition ($2.50 net), should satisfy the most discriminating. They are not over frequent, being only eight in number; each is a landscape pure and simple, without human figure or scarcely even the suggestion of human life; and they are of attractive coloring and outline. Mr. C. J. Longman introduces the book with some hitherto unpublished letters from Jefferies to his firm, at the time (1883) the work was first going through the press. In Albert B. Osborne's "As It Is in England" (McBride, Nast; $3 net) there are again lovely bits of English country and country towns. Mr. Osborne has avoided the cities, because, aside from London, which is too big for his purpose, they don't interest him. We meet the old standbys, the cathedrals, castles, universities, besides a cosey cottage here and there. Though the text is not distinguished, it forms pleasant reading.

For a view of nature as the scene of active life, and for an attractive holiday book, one may take "Winter Sports in Switzerland" (Dodd, Mead; $4 net). Skating, skiing, tobogganing, "tailing," known in this country as "hitching," and all the other out-of-doors games with which Switzerland makes merry in the winter are well caught in colors by C. Fleming Williams. The rich atmosphere and the varied lights on the mountains offered him an excellent background of color. Merely to look at all this pictured sport makes one breathe deeply and one's blood tingle. E. F. Benson, who is something of an authority on these subjects, besides being a writer of novels, furnishes the text, which runs to nearly 200 large pages. Not only is he most informing, he is able to convey the zest which the topics demand. We regret that there is room for only one sample:

> Then the glad word goes forth that the lake bears, and you hurry forth to skate on it. But mountain and wood and landscape are all mirrored in it as in perfectly still water, and it is almost incredible that here is ice a foot or two thick. Tremblingly you launch yourself on it, scarcely able to believe in its solidity; for through that unwavering surface you see every weed and stump under water. The very fishes flit and flick visibly below your feet.

Maeterlinck's "News of Spring and Other Nature Studies" is brought out in a choice edition by Dodd, Mead ($4 net). Alexander Teixeira de Mattos, who has done more than any one else to present this author in adequate English, is responsible for the text, and there are a number of full-page illustrations in color by Edward J. Detmold. If at first glance the colors seem a bit too vivid, closer observation will show that they are in reality calculated with great accuracy. Detailed studies of flowers and birds and insects are the subjects chosen.

Perhaps the most attractive of Mr. Mosher's books this season, both for substance and for form, is a reprint of Alexander Smith's "Dreamthorp," in clear type on a clean page, and with no nonsense. Mr. Mosher in his "foreword" speaks of a revival of interest in Smith's poetry and prose. Of the former, we are not so sure; it is hard to imagine the world taking the paroxysms of "A Life Drama" very seriously again; but this "book of essays written in the country" is full of good quiet writing, and has never lacked its warm admirers.

Mosher has also done well to bring out in a separate volume what is perhaps the most successful work of England's new laureate, "The Growth of Love." It is here reprinted in old-style Roman face from the unique edition in Fell's Old English type (100 numbered copies), published at Oxford in 1890; and will serve both as a timely gift and one of enduring worth. Dr. Bridges's own attitude towards this sonnet-sequence is expressed in number lviii. It may represent, considering his well-known aversion to publication, something more than conventional self-effacement:

> O my uncared-for songs, what are ye worth,
> That in my secret book with so much care
> I write you, this one here and that one there,
> Marking the time and order of your birth?
> Now, with a fancy so unkind to mirth,
> A sense so hard, a style so worn and bare,
> Look ye for any welcome anywhere
> From any shelf or heart-home on the earth?
> Should others ask you this, say then I yearned
> To write you such as once, when I was young,
> Finding I should have loved and thereto turned.
> 'Twere something yet to live again among
> The gentle youth beloved and where I learned
> My art be there remembered for my song.

Among Mr. Mosher's other new publications are Gilbert Murray's translation of the "Andromache" of Euripides, Mary F. Robinson's "Songs from an Italian Garden," and "The Sermon on the Mount."

F. Hopkinson Smith has done text and pictures for "In Thackeray's London" (Doubleday, Page; $3.50 net). The text is partly Hopkinson Smith and partly Thackeray, and wholly satisfactory, and the twenty-one full-page pictures in crayon are of a gray, shadowy, rain-soaked London. That is the advantage of England's capital over every other city. For London the artist need not resort to the expedient of blurring clear outlines and breaking rectilinear angles and covering sunshine with a mantle of mist. London offers all that ready made. It certainly has plenty of atmosphere on an autumn day of fog. What other capital can compare with a city in which fifteen years of fog and soot produce the most deceiving semblance of antiquity? Nothing can ever be new in London for more than two or three winters. Mr. Smith starts at the inevitable point—Charterhouse and Grey Friars and Col. Newcome, and ends with young Newcome and Pendennis in Middle Temple.

Among the many other holiday books we may mention Maeterlinck's "Our Friend the Dog," in unpretentious form (Dodd, Mead; $1.25 net). The translation has been made by Alexander Teixeira de Mattos and pictures of the short-lived Pelléas made by Cecil Alden. Four booklets of tinted paper hold sundry productions by Carolyn Wells (Franklin Bigelow Corporation). Their titles are "The Re-echo Club," "The Eternal Feminine," "Girls and Gaiety," and "Pleasing Prose." "The Wisdom of Bernard Shaw, being Passages from the Works of Bernard Shaw, chosen by Charlotte F. Shaw" (Brentano's; $1 net), is a volume of pocket size, having upwards of 400 pages and bound in a red leather sufficiently splashed with gilt to harmonize with the glitter of the contents. Those who confess to a liking for Harrison Fisher's paintings of fresh-checked girls and natty young men will find in Dodd, Mead & Co.'s "Beauties" ($3.50 net) a collection of his typical productions, printed and bound with a single eye to holiday attractiveness.

Buyers of books at this season may care to have their attention called to the titles of several large and handsome publications, which have just come to our table and must be reserved for more deliberate treatment than can be afforded them in this place. Longmans, Green & Co. have now ready Vols. XVII to XX of their great subscription edition of William Morris. From Dodd, Mead & Co. come "Scott's Last Expedition" in two large volumes ($10 net), Mrs. Hugh Fraser's "Italian Yesterdays," in two volumes ($6 net), and A. B. Chamberlain's "Hans Holbein, the Younger," in two quarto volumes ($16 net). All of these books are elaborately illustrated.

GOBINEAU'S "RENAISSANCE."

La Renaissance. Savonarole, César Borgia, Jules II, Léon X, Michel-Ange. Scènes Historiques. Par le Comte de Gobineau. Sixième edition, 1911. Paris: Plon.

The Renaissance. Savonarola, Cesare Borgia, Julius II, Leo X, Michael Angelo. Translated by Paul V. Cohn. Edited with an Introduction by Dr. Oscar Levy. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.75 net.

Cesare Borgia. By William Harrison Woodward. London: Chapman & Hall.

Maximilian the Dreamer, Holy Roman Emperor, 1459-1519. By Christopher Hare. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $3 net.

The emergence of Gobineau at this date illustrates the caprice which sometimes determines fame. George Meredith, writing to John Morley on February 1, 1906, says: "If you have not read the 'Renaissance' of the Comte de Gobineau, you will find pleasant relaxation in it. The ideas in the heads of the characters of the time are given with masterly sureness, in refreshing French." That reference, published in Meredith's "Letters" less than two years ago, apparently started up Mr. Cohn and other translators.

The tardiness of English recognition need not surprise us. On the Continent, however, Gobineau has long been not only well known, but even the object of a vigorous cult. It is from him, a Frenchman, that the Germans have drawn many of their arguments for militarism and their doctrines as to what constitutes a dominant race. For twenty years Gobineau societies have flourished in the Fatherland, "Gobinismus" has taken its place in the vocabulary of accepted political and racial truths, Gobineau's works have been translated into German, and many essays, critiques, and monographs have poured out upon them. In France also Gobineau long since came to his own. His "Renaissance," crowned by the Academy, has passed through six editions, and his seminal ideas have become common property: but he seems to have been accepted there as a politico-literary thinker, as an artist in pen-portraiture rather than as the apostle of a new creed. The fact that he regarded the French as a decadent and the German as a crescent people may account for the fact that his countrymen, with their usual intellectual hospitality, welcome him as a man of letters rather than as a prophet.

Born in 1816 of a noble family, Arthur Gobineau was a bookish youth, and a reader and thinker at the age when most of his class devoted themselves to dissipation. In 1848, he served De Tocqueville as secretary. Then he entered the diplomatic career, filling minor posts at Berne, Frankfort, and other places. He spent three years as first secretary at Teheran, thereby getting material for his "Histoire des Perses." For nearly twenty years he alternated between short sojourns in Paris and service at Athens, Rio de Janeiro, Stockholm, and the East. He died in 1882. The year before, he fell in with Richard Wagner, who, captivated by Gobineau's views on aristocracy and artists, published, in the Bayreuther Blätter, an article by him on "Heroism and Christianity." This led to the "discovery" of Gobineau by the Germans, who soon came to accept as gospel Gobineau's laws of race supremacy.

These had appeared in his epoch-making book, "Essai sur l'inégalité des races humaines," the first volume of which was printed in 1853, and the second in 1855. This is not the place for a critique of the "Essai"; suffice it to say that in it Gobineau investigates why some races have achieved greatness while others have remained mediocre, or have even sunk to be the subjects and slaves of the powerful. He concludes that purity of stock accounts for these differences, on which what we call moral considerations have little influence. That a race is strong is proof enough for him that it ought to be strong; and its aim should be to go on strengthening itself at the expense of its neighbors. This pleasant doctrine harmonized with the desires of the "superior" peoples of Europe when they set out, a quarter of a century ago, to subdue or assimilate "inferior" peoples; and, being based on the cornerstone of absolute aristocracy, it also fortified the theory of the Superman which has been exploited during the past two decades. In short, Gobineau had assembled the most characteristic elements in Nietzsche's system thirty years before Nietzsche himself. These would be reasons enough to explain Gobineau's importance; and to them should be added the fact that he was the spokesman of conservatism in its life-and-death struggle with democracy.

One may, however, read his "Renaissance," published in 1877, without a knowledge of these details; for in it Gobineau writes objectively, seeking neither to preach nor to persuade, but simply to exhibit the chief figures of that period in typical acts and utterances. He uses the dialogue as his medium, a device which lends objectivity to his portraits and has the advantage of sparing the reader long descriptions and explanations. But mere dialogue does not always result in dramatic quality, and on many occasions it resolves itself into monologues in which, as in Browning's best examples, we cannot always separate the author from his creation. There must inevitably be in such work a suggestion of the knowledge that comes by retrospect, which the actors themselves could not have had. Nevertheless, the total effect is one of verisimilitude: Gobineau has caught the strange drama of the Italian Renaissance in many of its most marked features, and he has painted them with remorseless veracity.

Only a doctrinaire, steeped in Gobineau's theory of racial and individual supremacy, would discover in "The Renaissance" a glorification of the pessimism which culminates in the Superman. If Gobineau chose the wickedest period of modern times because it gave the freest play to individuality, he does not hush up the horrors to which unbridled egotism led. The moralist can deduce from him a hundred arguments against the soul-killing license of the Renaissance, arguments just as cogent as, and more savory than, those which Dr. Levy, in his introduction, draws from him.

Gobineau devotes his dialogues to the careers of Savonarola, Cæsar Borgia, Julius II, Leo X, and Michael Angelo. Round each of these protagonists he groups a host of contemporaries, nearly all of whom have historical antecedents. Beginning with Savonarola, he shows how, when the Roman Church had reached the highest point of corruption, that God-fearing, terribly earnest friar tried to reform the church from within, and how, despite his genius and his zeal and the support of a righteous remnant, he was crushed by the monstrous ecclesiastical machine as ruthlessly as an Alpine climber by an avalanche. Only second to Savonarola in this dialogue are Alexander VI and Machiavelli—the Borgian Pope bent wholly on securing the greatness of his dynasty and his own sensual gratifications, Machiavelli longing for some master—a Mohammed, or even a Tamerlane—to rise up and guide the revolution. It is not by accident that Gobineau puts into the Borgian Pope's mouth, not into Machiavelli's, the rules of statecraft which have passed for Machiavellian.

We cannot mention, much less criticise in detail, even the most salient passages in the 550 pages of these dialogues. For subtlety, no portrait excels that of Alexander VI, with his superstition, his cruelty, his man-of-the-world politeness, his love of luxury and of the fine arts. He carries a holy wafer in a little gold box to ward off evil, just as a negro carries a rabbit's paw; and, not having it, he drinks the poison he has prepared for the cardinals. Cæsar Borgia is less complex, and his unblushing villanies necessarily shock us less than those of his father, whose position as head of the church made his iniquities tenfold worse. In Julius II we behold the familiar warrior-prelate, who loved fighting before all things, whose conscience troubled him with no scruples, who seemed at times to doubt the efficacy of the crucifix, but never that of the sword. Leo X is admirably sketched, as in the scene with the Saxon envoy Maltitz—come to discuss Luther's arraignment of Tetzel—whom the Pope dismisses with the words: "I am disposed to remain conciliatory in all matters, provided that the needs of the Apostolic Chamber are satisfied." To which Cardinal Bibbiena adds: "My dear Maltitz, you understand that we do not care whether the money comes by way of indulgences or otherwise; but remember that in any case we want the money, and you must not imagine that we will yield an obolus of this money."

Such passages, which crystallize the irreligion of the heads of the church, are, however, only bits of the great whole. Gobineau, who professed himself a Roman Catholic to the end, had no quarrel with the church. To him, clerical corruption was merely an incident in the vast historic episode. He describes the sins and foibles of kings, soldiers, scholars, politicians, and artists with equally pitiless impartiality. Contrary, perhaps, to his intention, but wholly in harmony with the fact as he states it, the Renaissance, which we were to admire as the Golden Age when individualism, freed from moral restraints, was to blossom in a thousand beautiful talents, turns out to be the heyday of primitive lusts, passions, and ferocities. Even the artists, whose work alone remains to gladden posterity, seem mere accessories to the general orgy of Supermen. But Gobineau does not show us, we do not feel sure that he could show, an inevitable connection between moral and social degeneration and splendid achievements in art.

Nevertheless, Gobineau keeps the artist constantly in mind. The one figure who comes and goes through his dialogues is Michael Angelo, with whose death, indeed, he regards the Renaissance as closed. If there be any character in his dramatis personæ through whom the author himself seems to speak, it is precisely Michael Angelo. We cite two characteristic passages:

"I am an artist," says Buonarotti, "and I see in the world only my work, and above all our holy religion. I do not inquire why the Lord God—blessed be his name—has put on the earth so many princes, captains, and podestas, who devour each other. Their only occupation ought to be to do virtuous deeds, punish vice, and protect the arts. They do just the opposite. God ought to suppress them. It is true that then we should fall into the hands of the populace, the vilest beast that ever crawled on the ground."

In that last sentence speaks Gobineau, who had seen the blue-bloused Parisian mob swarm up the boulevards in 1848, and had thereafter loathed Demos in all his forms. So he puts into Michael Angelo's mouth, at the close of the book, what we may regard as his own summing up of the Renaissance:

I knew Brother Savonarola, and the aspect of his august face has never vanished from my memory. I have lived by his teachings. Either because he demanded too much of us, or because poor Italy presumed too much upon her forces and imagination in her was disproportioned to honesty, Italy quitted his hands and remained in those of vice. Yet, nevertheless, she felt herself; she was conscious of her superiority over the rest of the world. She despised other countries and used their resources for her own ends; they held her in admiration and she knew it. She knew that she was great and dreamed only of becoming greater. Her artists . . . you know what they have been! Now, all is over. The fire is extinguished. There exists no Italy more. Those whom we disdained become our masters. The artists have perished. I am the last survivor of the holy phalanx; what they call by the same glorious name we bore are now only traders, and not without impudence. It was time indeed to die! We die ill, miserably. What matter? There have been beautiful souls, glorious souls in this Italy, henceforth enslaved and prostrate. I do not regret to have lived. . . . We leave great things after us and great examples. Earth is richer than she was before we came.

The restraint of utterance which characterizes this farewell belongs to Gobineau throughout his book. He is no maker of epigrams. He never resorts to rhetoric to heighten his effects. Though the persons and episodes he describes are among the most extraordinary exemplars of romanticism running riot, Gobineau treats them as a classicist. This does not mean that he disdains realistic touches in order to enhance the lifelikeness of his presentation. Take, for instance, the Florentine citizen who, at the execution of Savonarola, says to his wife: "It was a pretty fine ceremony, and even imposing! But I think it's going to rain. Let's go home." To which she replies: "Yes, my dear, let's go home! I am afraid of catching cold." By such a sardonic stroke—and there are many of them—Gobineau reminds us of the tragic contrast between the supreme moments of human passion and historical crisis, and the indifference with which dull persons behold them. He never falls into the "pathetic fallacy," for he knows too well the insensibility of Nature to Man's joys and sorrows. While he has at his command the historical facts, he does not always stick slavishly to historical sequence; for his purpose is, primarily, to interpret the significance of the Renaissance. So he dates the last interview between Michael Angelo and Vittoria Colonna thirteen years after her death; and in other cases he prefers the spirit to the letter of the records. Occasionally, as in the matter of the poisoning of the cardinals by Alexander VI, investigations made since Gobineau wrote have either raised doubts or reversed earlier opinions.

But after all necessary qualifications, "The Renaissance" remains essentially a true book, in which one of the most amazing episodes in history is vividly embodied. It extenuates nothing; it sets down naught in malice; it leaves you, in the main, to draw your own deductions. If Gobineau had possessed Voltaire's style, it might have been a literary masterpiece; but even so, one feels that it must have been easier deliberately to satirize wickedness in "Candide" than to spread dispassionately on the vast canvas of "The Renaissance" a host of persons who reveal themselves heart and soul to the life. With Gobineau to personalize the Renaissance, and Burckhardt to generalize its manners, customs, and ideals, one who is not a specialist can come at its essence.

Mr. Cohn's translation, although not distinguished, is readable, and, wherever we have compared it with the French we have found it trustworthy. Dr. Oscar Levy's introduction, whether in tone or substance, is most objectionable. That the fastidious aristocrat Gobinean, who detested vulgarians and disdained to take part in controversies or to defend his views in public—leaving his books to speak for him—should be championed by a ranting atheist, is irony without mitigation. It is not the atheism that he would object to; it is the crudity, the lack of knowledge, the vulgarity of manner, the raw-turnip flavor. We infer that Dr. Levy, who is Nietzsche's English sponsor, venerates Nietzsche, Stendhal, and Gobineau as mankind's supreme products. His introduction deals chiefly with Gobineau's theories of racial primacy and of aristocracy, with digressions in which he aims bungling sarcasm at the poor god of the nineteenth century, or assails H. S. Chamberlain, or expatiates on the blunders of "the hopeless Nazarene." These topics, and many others, have nothing to do with "The Renaissance."

Of the two recent books included under our title, Professor Woodward's "Cesare Borgia" deserves commendation as a solid piece of work. He has examined the authorities without prejudice, and, having canvassed the conclusions of modern historians, he gives his own verdict dispassionately. He has the historic sense well developed. His printing of the text of a score of documents adds to the value of his volume, in which, while some of the sensational crimes attributed to the Borgias are disproved or doubted, the general charges against them are confirmed.

Mr. Christopher Hare is too well-known a bookmaker to require an introduction. He is a popularizer of history through the medium of striking personages. In Maximilian I he takes for his hero the Emperor whose reign corresponded with the culmination of the Italian Renaissance, and whose policy led him to meddle in Italy. Mr. Hare has perhaps exaggerated "the dreamer's" ability and good qualities; but he is justified in exalting the interest of Maximilian's career.

CURRENT FICTION.

The Passionate Friends. By H. G. Wells. New York: Harper & Bros.

Mr. Wells has hit upon an effective expedient for giving this story an individual atmosphere. Middle-aged Stephen Stratton is supposed to write it for the future benefit of his son, still a child at the time of its writing. So far as it is a confession, it is that of one man to another, outside the conventional relation of father and son. He fears that he may never be able to break down that convention in speech, and that with the years he may "become inaccessible as old people are sometimes inaccessible"—as his own father has been. But confession is not a word that Mr. Wells uses. One needs, in whatever shadowy sense, a conviction of sin for that. Stephen Stratton, with all his regrets, with all his sorrow in the past, looks upon himself as a product, a type of family and race; and sadly yet not despairingly predicts for his son, so like him in body and temperament, an experience not unlike his own.

There is much in these pages of Wellsian dreaming about a new fraternity, a new social order, a new world-race. The man Stratton at last devotes his life to the great vague cause of progress-by-unification. But this comes about half by chance—humanity being sought as a refuge from the unhappiness of an individual. The real story is the old story of a man and two women. Lady Mary is the sweetheart and companion of his youth. At first glance, she might be the old-fashioned heroine, the shrinking, beauteous one, longing to be wooed, and helpless in the arms of her lover. But her slenderness, her blue eyes, and golden hair, belong to a very modern person. The first kiss of the young pair is as much her doing as his: she is his equal in age, in authority, in mind. She has a stronger consciousness of self than he—loves him but will not leave her tower for him: "I don't want to become some one's certain possession," she cries, "to be just usual and familiar to any one. No, not even to you. . . . Don't you see?—I want to be wonderful to you, Stevenage, more than to any one. I want—I want always to make your heart beat faster. I want always to be coming to you with my own heart beating faster. Always and always I want it to be like that." So she will not have her Stephen, and, to insure that thrilling attachment, engages herself to another man. It is understood that the marriage is to be nominal, but that does not console Stephen, and he goes off to South Africa. It is not his fault that instead of finding the quietus of a Boer bullet, he returns, some years later, one of the lions of the war. Presently there comes a new intimacy with Lady Mary, lapsing from strained friendship into the entanglement of the flesh. Then follow suffering, scandal, and what the narrator somewhat pretentiously calls "tragedy" in the suicide of Lady Mary. Nobody comes out unscathed, least of all the innocent (but wise) Rachel, whom Stratton has married, and for whose son he tells his story. Yet, looking back, he discerns in the figure of Lady Mary, in his own figure, "a symbolical value," not as sinners from whose sin the world may draw a moral, but as victims of a false civilization—beings with "a sense of fine things entangled and stifled and unable to free themselves from the ancient limiting jealousies which law and custom embody."

There we are! Mr. Wells is but another victim, more intelligent than some others, of that passing belief that somehow happiness is to result for humanity from setting the emotions free of restraint rather than from the deliberate adjustment of the individual to the responsibilities imposed upon him.

An Average Man. By Robert Hugh Benson. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co.

Mr. Benson has adopted in this book one of the most effective of all modes of religious propaganda—the method of what one may call the non-argumentative argument. He employs all conceivable means for the making of converts to Catholicism save that of direct exposition of Catholic doctrine. He is constantly on the verge of exposition, but he goes no further. His characters are often found engaged in heated religious argument, but no sooner do we come upon them than some semi-personal issue arises and takes precedence. And yet one does not have the impression that the author is evasive, or that he avoids the main issue because he cannot grapple with it. On the contrary, one feels that he has held himself back, that, in deference to the proprieties of the novel, he has not tried to create belief in any other way than by showing the effects of faith, and lack of faith, upon character.

When we close the book, however, we realize that every turn of events has its tactical effect. The very fact that the hero does not after all become a convert, is a part of the general scheme of the book, by which Catholicism takes on the charm of a lost cause and a forsaken belief. The Anglican Church stands for worldly success, for propriety and convention; the Catholic, in some part through the social disrepute that attaches to it, appears a refuge of spirituality and idealism. With a fortune newly acquired, but an appropriate place among county families still to make, the hero finds that Catholicism would be too much of a handicap in his career, and beats an inglorious retreat. He is, after all, only "an average man."

The Lovely Lady. By Mary Austin. New York: Doubleday, Page & Co.

Mrs. Austin's story has color instead of plot. The Lady appeared to Peter in his boyhood and her face often took on the features of those he loved best. She was his dream princess, and lived in a Wonderful House with "walls of shining pale greenish gold," amidst gardens. She was to Peter the princess whom St. George had saved in killing the fire-spitting dragon. And as the Lovely Lady became the princess, Peter became the knight. For he, too, had a dragon to encounter—he was paying off the mortgage on the house in which his mother and crippled sister lived. Peter also was full of courage, but he discovered that "princesses were for fairy-tales—that girls want Things." So Peter determined to get rich and overcome the dragon Things. He left for New York and struggled for success, forgotten and forsaken even by his dream princess.

But as he grew richer and overcame the dragon Things, he felt the need of something beyond riches. When he met Eunice Goodward, he thought she was his long-sought princess. But the princess proved faithless and Peter went to the Old World to find the Shining House with its gates of music wherein he might find comfort. He found pools and cypress and "the fountain's soft incessant rain," but not the Wonderful House. Then the Girl appeared, and he saw her as he knew he should always see her—"his wife and the Lovely Lady." And for the first time the Wonderful House opened to him the gates of home.

Mrs. Austin's delicate touch, the play of color, and the aspects of fairyland that rise from every page, as well as the little practical lessons she sees fit to insert, leave the reader in no mood for criticism.

Youth Will Be Served. By Dolf Wyllarde. New York: John Lane Co.

Nothing happens in this novel. But then a great deal might have happened; and since the spice of life is in its hopes and fears, there is ample defence in logic and common-sense for the story-teller who adopts the plan of making his story thrilling by not having any. It must be supposed in the present instance that the lady who calls herself Dolf Wyllarde has proceeded with deliberation. For she is no tyro at the game, and she has charged her book with possibilities of the most explosive sort. Here are some of the ingredients: A young wife in London and an elderly husband engaged in fighting his country's battles in India and the like remote places, an admirable male cousin of the absent husband acting as Mentor, an admiring troupe of young men holding commissions in the Household Cavalry, a neat flat in Knightsbridge overlooking Hyde Park, acquaintance in musical and stock-broking circles, a handsome and unscrupulous Jewess, supper parties off the Strand with partners one would not care to invite to meet one's own set, and motor rides with persons of the same sort.

It is the heroine who calls these little affairs "Cur Parties." But they are all perfectly innocent, bless you! Of course, meantime, the reader's feelings are going to be harrowed. Supposing the lady should kick over the traces! Supposing Cousin Mentor were to turn out to be no better than Lancelot and Tristan and such fellows! Supposing one of the curs were to bite the fair hand that condescended! Supposing the handsome and unscrupulous Jewess should steal the sable coat or lead captive the young son, by this time out of Eton and ready for Sandhurst! Supposing on some motor trip the host (no better than he should be) should not ride in front with the chauffeur! Supposing—but the explosive possibilities are endless. As already intimated, the book is full of them.

And, then, the London smart set is all about you—you look out of your back windows upon the Park, you buy your things in Bond Street, you meet titled persons at parties, and you have elderly relatives who cling to Victorian traditions and give you Prayer Books. The author knows the trick.

TRUE PROSPERITY.

Wealth and Welfare. By A. C. Pigou. New York: The Macmillan Co. $3.25 net.

It is a popular delusion, declares Professor Pigou, that while economic science itself is a difficult subject, the discussion of practical problems, in which economic forces play an important part, can safely be undertaken without special preparation. There is, as he rightly says, no warrant for this view. The study of economic theory is, indeed, difficult; but the application of the knowledge which that study wins to the guidance of practical affairs is an even harder task; for it needs not only a full understanding of the theory, but also the trained judgment that can balance against one another a large number of qualifying considerations. This would be the case even if human life were such that economic welfare and welfare in general were coincident terms. But, in fact, man does not live by bread alone; and, therefore, besides estimating the probable economic consequences of his action, a reformer needs always to beware lest, in his ardor to promote economic benefit, he may sacrifice unwittingly some higher and more elusive good.

Professor Pigou's analysis of the task constitutes one of the most painstaking economic works of recent years. The wealth and variety of information which he employs remind the reader of Adam Smith, as does also the subtlety of his dissections. And one might suppose, too, that he had once occupied the chair of moral philosophy; yet one must not expect to find here that almost artless diction which characterizes the most complicated discussions in "The Wealth of Nations." The reader understands at the start that he has a task before him, but he sees also that the task is well worth the effort.

This work might almost be called an analysis of human consciousness; for Professor Pigou begins by telling us that welfare can belong only to states of consciousness, his aim being to make clear the distinctions between economic welfare and general welfare, and to show the interplay of the two. He tells us, for example, that causes that modify economic welfare may influence other parts of welfare, not directly, but indirectly through objective conditions of welfare other than the national dividend. The most important of these conditions are the services rendered by certain objects of natural beauty, and those rendered by persons, for which no money payment is made. The effect of economic causes on objects of natural beauty is illustrated by the frequent desolation of beautiful scenery through the hunt for coal or gold, the desecration widely wrought by uncontrolled smoke from factories, and the degraded form frequently assumed by public advertisements. Effects or services rendered by certain people occur whenever economic causes, such as Poor Law or factory regulations, or fluctuations in the demand for men's labor, divert women workers from factory work or paid home-work to unpaid home-work, in attendance on their children, economical preparation of the family meals, repair of the family clothes, thoughtful expenditure of housekeeping money, and so on. It is clear, in cases of this kind, that the changes that appear in economic welfare result almost entirely from the definition that Professor Pigou has selected for that term, and do not represent any considerable change in total welfare.

For the most part, economic causes act upon economic welfare, not directly, but through the national dividend. The gross national dividend consists of the annual flow of those goods and services that can easily be brought into relation with a money measure, and the true net dividend consists of the gross national dividend minus an appropriate allowance for depreciation of capital. If a cause is introduced which makes for an increase in the aggregate size of the net national dividend, provided that the absolute share of no group of members, in terms of the commodities which that group is accustomed chiefly to consume, decreases, the economic welfare of the community as a whole is likely to be augmented. If a cause is introduced which makes for an increase in the absolute share of relatively poor groups of persons, provided that the magnitude of the aggregate national dividend does not decrease, economic welfare is likely to be augmented. If a cause is introduced which diminishes the variability, or inequality in time, of the dividend, and especially of that part of it which accrues to the poorer classes, economic welfare is likely to be augmented.

On these theses the present work is built up. The argument is too closely knit, is the product of too many streams of observation and reflection, to admit of recapitulation in remarks of this length. The inference which we draw first and last from all that Professor Pigou has to say is that to keep the national dividend undiminished is the only sure means of safeguarding individual welfare. His chapters on the distribution of the national dividend, in which he discusses at some length attempts to improve the distribution by the deliberate transference of resources from relatively rich to relatively poor persons, reflect powers of analysis of the highest order. We are reminded that the advantage to the real income of the poor, which an act of transference brings about immediately, can only prove an advantage on the whole, if the act does not involve an injury to the magnitude of the national dividend. The consequences of artificial and differential wage-rates are here explained, as are also those of direct attempts at transference by philanthropists or the state on behalf of the less fortunate classes. The reader need not be told that a discussion of such points as these strikes at the very heart of the most important practical problems of the present day. There are many theorists who would like to diminish the portion of the national dividend now going to the rich and increase that of the poorer classes. Professor Pigou does not afford these much encouragement in connection with artificial and differential wage rates. He does say, however, that there is little doubt that plans could be devised which would enable transference from rich to poor to be made with results advantageous to production. This end could be attained through Government establishment of a national minimum of conditions, below which the fortunes of any citizen are not allowed to fall. Economic welfare, he says, is best promoted by the establishment of a national minimum at such a level that the direct good resulting from the marginal transference to the poor just balances the indirect evil brought about by the consequent reduction of the dividend. This is admirable, but is it certain that the human mind could be found which could strike this balance? If not, what would happen?

A History of Continental Criminal Procedure, with Special Reference to France. By A. Esmein. Translated by John Simpson. Boston: Little, Brown & Co. $4.50 net.

This is the fifth volume in the Continental Legal History series, published under the auspices of the Association of American Law Schools. Although the title-page ascribes the authorship to Professor Esmein, several chapters are taken from the writings of Professors Garrand and Mittermaier. These have been woven together very deftly, and the book is interesting and instructive. No American lawyer can read it without learning many things. He may be surprised, at times, as when he reads on page 595: "The criminal procedure is less formal in the United States than in England. Technical errors in procedure are immaterial, unless they impair the material rights of the defence." Such statements will make him wonder whether the author is mistaken, or whether our American agitators for reform in criminal procedure have been too much disturbed.

In the four prefaces and introductions to this volume, the American reader is congratulated upon the opportunity here afforded to gain wisdom from the experience of continental nations. It is suggested that "America could benefit by imitating to some extent the mixed type of criminal procedure now in use on the Continent of Europe"; and the assertion is made that "criminal procedure in the United States is half a century or more behind that of Great Britain and Continental Europe."

A careful perusal of the volume has led us to a different conclusion. In our opinion, it warrants the American citizen in congratulating himself that he is not subject to the criminal law of France or Germany. Undoubtedly, he can learn much from the experience of the French, under their various systems of criminal procedure, but it will be chiefly by way of warning. This appears to be the view of Professor Esmein, as well as of such statesmen as M. Briand and M. Ribot. They believe in the public accusatory methods of the English procedure, which are our methods also. One of the best historical sketches of the English jury system (which we have inherited) is found in this volume, as well as one of the strongest arguments for the retention of that system. Professor Esmein has unstinted praise for the members of the State's Council, who braved the opposition of Napoleon and gained the victory for jury trials, in criminal cases, while he laments the fact that they were not able to discard entirely the harsh methods of the old inquisitorial system. His belief in the value of the jury for criminal trials is unshakable:

> The jury is one of the institutions, the happy product of history in a particularly favorable environment, which is found to answer the crying needs of civilized humanity. Born among the English, adopted by the French Revolution, it is being propagated gradually along with modern civilization, like the constitutional government and the civil State. A great civilized nation cannot renounce it without losing its rank. It is, it may be said, one of those conquests which, once achieved, are final.

Professor Esmein deprecates the present French rule which forbids a summing up by the presiding judge; and prefers the English practice, under which the judge "directs the jury as to the rules according to which their verdict must be rendered," and uses "his authority to make the jury feel the weight and import of the evidence." French experience, upon this point, should warn us against weakening the influence of the judge and subordinating him either to the emotions of the jury or the caprice or the populace.

The lessons to be learned by Americans from this volume appear to be these: Retain the grand and petit juries in their integrity. Have all criminal proceedings conducted publicly. Maintain a well-educated and independent judiciary to preside at criminal trials; to decide all questions of law; to make a clear and impartial statement to the jury of the issues of fact in the case, and to pass upon appeals from the trial court. Rid criminal procedure of its technicalities, so far as this can be done without injustice to the prisoner. Give no heed to the strident demand for the adoption of some Continental system of criminal procedure in the place of that which we have inherited, as one of the institutions of English common law. Be ready always to reform criminal procedure, but reject all schemes for revolution.

The German Classics of the Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries. Masterpieces of German Literature Translated into English. Vols. I, II, and III. Edited by Kuno Francke and William Guild Howard. New York: The German Publication Society.

German literature is still largely an unexplored field to those unfamiliar with the language, and to give English readers a survey of the classic writers through good translations is certainly a commendable plan. It must be said that the publishers of the work before us have, to judge from the first three volumes, missed a rare opportunity, though it is fair to add that the real work of the editors, whose names appear on the title-page, promises to become more apparent in the subsequent volumes. The intrinsic importance of what has so far been done scarcely justifies the elaborate apparatus of editors, especial writers, translators, and consulting boards of foreign authorities, that has been set in motion for this enterprise. We find in the three volumes translations, all well known, of several of the dramatic masterpieces of Goethe and Schiller, together with renderings, also old for the most part, of some of their poems and of various prose writings. Thus, we have of Goethe the "Iphigenia in Tauris," the entire "Faust" (minus, however, the "Dedication," the "Prologue on the Stage," and the "Prologue in Heaven"), the "Elective Affinities," and an extract from "Wilhelm Meister's Travels"; while of Schiller there is "The Death of Wallenstein" and "William Tell." Twenty-six poems by Goethe and fifteen by Schiller appear in the collection.

Opinions will differ as to the selections made. Of Goethe we have neither "Der Gott und die Bajadere," nor "Die Braut von Korinth," nor "Der Zauberlehrling." The editors have done wisely in availing themselves of Anna Swanwick's translations of the "Iphigenia" and of "Faust," and of Ellen Frothingham's admirable rendering of "Hermann und Dorothea"; but there certainly was no need of including Lord Lytton's wooden version of "Der Graf von Habsburg."

Of fresh translations there is little in these volumes, and that none of the best, unless we except Charles Wharton Stork's spirited rendering of Goethe's "Greeting and Departure." On the whole, poetry fares better than prose at the hands of the translators, though Miss Julia Franklin's version of Goethe's "Shakespeare und kein Ende" deserves a word of praise; Professor Coleman's verse is far more idiomatic than Dr. Louis H. Gray's translation of Goethe's "Letters to Wilhelm von Humboldt and his Wife." The opening sentence of the first letter reads:

> How many an hour have I thought of you with genuine and lively interest; and nearly every time I have marvelled at the outrageous intention which correspondents can express, that when far apart they will write to eaeh other once a month.

Such handling of Goethe's prose is unfortunately only too common with English translators. It is the irony of fate that halting phrases should be put into the mouth of the great German to whom the world owes the classic translation of Benvenuto Cellini's "Autobiography," of Diderot's "Le Neveu de Monsieur Rameau," of Manzoni's ode to "The Fifth of May," and Voltaire's "Mahomet" and "Tancrède." And how full of charm are his versions of the letters addressed to him by Carlyle and Walter Scott, and how sound his advice to translators!

The editors have prefixed to the first volume a General Introduction by the eminent critic, Prof. Richard M. Meyer, of the University of Berlin. In itself this is a valuable piece of writing, though by no means an exhaustive survey of the subject, and we fear it will not be found easily comprehensible by English readers unacquainted with the main currents of German literature. At all events, as here presented, what Professor Meyer has to say falls strangely on English ears. It may safely be said that no English or American writer on the subject would have expressed himself as Professor Meyer does. The following passage will make our meaning clear:

> On the whole, however, German lyric poetry is rather made up of simple formations in the style of the folk-song, especially since the important rhythmic transformation of this material by Heine created new possibilities for accommodating the inner form to new subject-matter without conspicuously changing the outer form. For two great simplifying factors have, since Goethe, been predominant in protecting our lyric poetry from unfruitful artificiality; the influence of the folk-song and the connection with music have kept it more full of vital energy than the too literary lyric poetry of the French, and richer in variety than the too cultivated lyric of the English. Whoever shut the door on the influences spoken of, as did Franz Grillparzer or Hebbel, and, in a different way, Annette von Droste-Hülshoff or Heinrich Leuthold, at the same time nullified a good part of his efficiency.

This is difficult reading, though probably a literal translation; what the English reader finds cloudy, the German accepts unhesitatingly in the original. The volumes contain valuable articles on Goethe and Schiller, by Prof. Calvin Thomas, and there are various other scholarly and readable critical notices.

It is to be hoped that succeeding volumes (there are to be twenty in all) may disclose greater originality and more striking merits than are discoverable in the three at hand. Much certainly is promised by the publishers. The external appearance of the work is that of the various voluminous anthologies of literature to which we have become accustomed. The paper is scarcely good enough, and the illustrations vary greatly in merit, some of them being very pleasing, while others are poor reprints.

Notes

Putnams publish this week "The Rise of the Novel: Johnson and his Circle," being Vol. X of "The Cambridge History of English Literature," edited by A. W. Ward and A. R. Waller, and "The Sonnets of William Shakespeare: New Light and Old Evidence," by the Countess de Chambrun.

Among the new books which Revells are bringing out is "The Story-Life of the Son of Man," by Wayne Whipple.

The Oxford University Press announces for immediate publication "The Layman's Old Testament," which will be procurable in two volumes or one. It comprises the major part of the Old Testament, with selections from the Apocrypha, edited with brief notes by Canon Glazebrook. The text is that of the Revised Version, amended by the use of many of the marginal readings. Leviticus, Chronicles, Esther, Lamentations, and the Song of Solomon are omitted entirely, and also repetitions, passages in which the text is unintelligible, and certain Hebrew forms of speech which are too frank for modern taste and add nothing to the sense.

It is announced by the Henry Bradshaw Society of London that the introduction to the "Stowe Missal" is now in the press and that this work will be completed by the publication at an early date of the long-delayed second volume.

Professor Haverfield has enlarged the paper which he read as the Creighton Lecture to the University of London and also submitted in part to the London Conference on Town-Planning, and it is about to be published under the title "Ancient Town-Planning," by the Oxford University Press. Greek and Roman town-planning—in Italy and the Roman provincial towns—is dealt with, and there are also a chapter on Roman building laws, an appendix on town-planning in China, and thirty-six plans and other illustrations.

The seventh annual meeting of the American Association for Labor Legislation will be held at the Shoreham Hotel, in Washington, on Tuesday and Wednesday, December 30 and 31. The programme this year, which includes a joint session with the American Political Science Association, will bring out prominently the plans of the Federal Industrial Relations Commission, recently appointed by President Wilson.

Prizes amounting to $2,000 have been awarded to winners of the Hart, Schaffner & Marx essay contests for 1913. The first prize of $1,000 was won by Arthur E. Suffern, a graduate student of Columbia University, for a paper entitled "Conciliation and Arbitration in the Coal Industry in the United States." The second prize in the graduate contest was given to G. P. Watkins, formerly a graduate student of Cornell University, now of the Public Service Commission, New York city. He produced a paper entitled "Welfare as an Economic Quantity," and received a prize of $500. In the contest among undergraduates, the first prize of $300 went to Jenss Waldo Myers, Cornell University, for a paper entitled "Unemployment." The second prize for undergraduates, amounting to $200, was given to Fred W. Eckert of Northwestern University, who wrote an essay on "Government Regulation of Public Utility Securities."

Longmans have a new edition, in cheaper form, of Andrew Lang's "Maid of France."

The third edition of Jessie Thornley Clarke's "Songs of the South" (Doubleday, Page) differs from the first only in the omission of three poems: "All Quiet Along the Potomac" and "The Long Ago" having been shown to be wrongly credited, and the biographer of George D. Prentice having confessed error in attributing "A Name in the Sand" to that journalist. This excellent anthology contains many poems by minor Southern writers, from St. George Tucker to living hands, not conveniently to be found elsewhere.

We recall a preacher of a generation ago whose method of sermonizing was to choose one of the abstract virtues, such as faith or humility, and illustrate it by a seriatim application to the Biblical characters, beginning always with Adam. By a somewhat similar method, rather popular among the anthropologists, Lewis Leopold has built up a sizable volume on "Prestige," to which the publishers (Dutton) have given an imposing appearance. Mr. Leopold brings to his task a large store of reading, literary, historical, and anthropological, which makes some of his pages interesting, though more of them are dull, and the book as a whole seems pointless. To acquire prestige among your fellows you must be just above their comprehension. Prestige need not imply intrinsic excellence; it is none the less an important social force; but "persons of value" should not make prestige an end in itself. It should seem that so lame a conclusion might be demonstrated more briefly. The book abounds in obscure and ill-constructed sentences of a kind to suggest that the writer, though a man of culture, is not quite at home in the English language.

Rabindranath Tagore, now of Nobel prize fame, is, if the vulgar image may be permitted, making hay while the sun shines. In the Nation of November 20 his love poems, "The Gardener," were noticed, and now we have two further volumes from him. One of these, "The Crescent Moon" (Macmillan), is a book of "child-poems" prettily rendered into English from the original Bengali by the author himself. This volume has eight illustrations in color.

The other new book by Mr. Tagore is of a different character altogether. It is called "Sādhanā" (Macmillan), and is a study of the ancient Hindu philosophy of the Upanishads for modern use. We must say frankly that we do not take more pleasure in this adaptation than in most of the others of the same kind, whether they be produced by the various Hindu propagandist societies or by private Oriental gentlemen who have a passion for reconciling Jesus and Krishna, or by enthusiasts of the Occident who have gone astray in the mazes of the Vedānta.

A fair specimen of Mr. Tagore's philosophy may be found on page 28:

> To understand anything is to find in it something which is our own, and it is the discovery of ourselves outside us which makes us glad. This relation of understanding is partial, but the relation of love is complete. In love the sense of difference is obliterated and the human soul fulfils its purpose in perfection, transcending the limits of itself and reaching across the threshold of the infinite.

Which is pretty enough gush, though woefully trite. It may even have a parallel in some Sanskrit passage of the Upanishads or Brāhmanas, for anything may be found in those books, but it is about as far from their real spirit as the sunset is from the sunrise. We have here merely another illustration of the modern, rather flabby mysticism which is crusading over the world.

Most writers of travels are so cocksure of freshness and a new literary point of view that it is pleasant to find George Hamlin Fitch admitting, in "The Critic in the Occident" (Elder), to a mere journalistic motive. As in "The Critic in the Orient," his sketches are entertaining and clear, but serve their best purpose as the matrix of a wide array of photographs. Greece, Italy, and France are each shown in fifteen well-chosen plates, in sepia; London and New York have between them twenty more, and there are ten photographic inserts of scenes varying from Pompeii to Fifth Avenue. The word "critic" means only, in Mr. Fitch's words, that in long years as literary editor of the San Francisco Examiner he had so developed the "newspaper instinct" that to jot down observations upon his peregrinations was "as the breath of [his] nostrils."

"Self-Realization" (Holt), by Henry W. Wright, of Lake Forest College, is a fresh attempt to solve the difficult problem of introducing the undergraduate to the significance of moral philosophy. Following in general the course laid by T. H. Green, Professor Wright has steered clear of the Scylla of mere practical moralizing, but he has not escaped the Charybdis of abstractness and remoteness. One reason is that his handling of the ethical problem is not quite rigorous. Especially unsatisfactory is his treatment of the crucial problem of self-sacrifice. Does it pay to sacrifice self on behalf of social welfare? Mr. Wright seeks to prove that it does pay, and even that such a sacrifice would be recommended by an enlightened self-interest. In that case one fails to see why egoistic motives are condemned as inadequate. Mr. Wright offers no discoveries in the field of ethics. He is content to present the conventional morality of the more idealistic sort as final. The treatment of the subject is, however, comprehensive and well-ordered, and in these important respects the book is not ill-suited for its purpose as a text.

Prof. John M. Gillette's "Constructive Rural Sociology" (Sturgis & Walton) is a product of the growing interest in country life. There are not many essentials of rural existence about which we cannot here acquire solid information, and often helpful suggestion. The author has much to say concerning the types and the advantages and disadvantages of country life. He deals extensively with the economics of agricultural production, the question of the improvement of transportation and communication not being neglected. Rural health and sanitation, the task of making farm life attractive, the socialization of country life, each of these vital subjects is discussed sanely and sympathetically. The value of such a work cannot be overestimated by any one familiar with rural conditions in America. Economists and social philosophers continually preach a "return to the land," often without reflecting that a return to the land means the abandonment of much that "exalts and embellishes civilized life." If the conditions of rural life are still such as to repel those who have passed their lives in cities, it is a fair inference that they are unworthy of those who have clung to the land. Doubtless rural conditions are improving in many ways, as Professor Gillette instances; but that very much remains to be done to make country life as inspiring as it should be, is easily gleaned from these pages. The author has attempted to give the facts and conditions of country life a broad sociological interpretation, and has achieved no small measure of success. We know the farmer and his needs better than before.

"Louis XI and Charles the Bold" (Moffat, Yard), by Lieut.-Col. Andrew C. P. Haggard, is a journalesque and disjointed narrative of some 400 pages, based upon secondary accounts and an uncritical reading of Commines and other memoirs. It adds nothing to our knowledge of the subject, furnishes no new interpretation of the facts, and is not even a well-told story. The author has scarcely understood the odd mixture of qualities which goes by the name of Louis XI, and has done nothing more with him than to present, by means of cheap literary devices, some of the more superficial characteristics of the man. A good life of Louis XI in English would be welcome; but the present book may be safely ignored by serious students, while those who desire only entertainment will do well to go straight to the memoirs.

"Sirenica" (Lane), by W. Compton Leith, is by turns an apology and an indictment of the man-destroying sisters called Sirens. Their lay entices, not as the vulgar believe to sensual pleasure, but to dissent, hatred of common things, high adventure. The Sirens are the goddesses of romance, eternally disquieting a world whose interest it is to submit to classic restraint. A reasonable and enduring happiness can never come to him who has heard the Sirens sing—only a fleeting ecstasy and uncertain joy. Our author passes in review the course of the world, and finds it an attempt at reason and a quest of happiness ever thwarted by the fact that many of the best will follow instead illusion (or is it higher reality?) in the realm the Sirens rule. As might be expected from the author of "Apologia Diffidentis," the style is distinguished with a preciosity that at times becomes saccharine. The publisher has shown a sense of Mr. Leith's literary models in making the book with ruled pages, like a seventeenth-century duodecimo. This is in every way an unusual and delightful book for a fastidious reader. A quotation will show that Mr. Leith is by no means unqualifiedly the champion of the Sirens; at least, he gives fair warning of their hidden talons:

> Like the rule of some rigid order, the service of the Sirens chills human sympathy; theirs is a sequestering law, too strange to share with many. Every hour of abandonment, each adventurous escape, enfeebles the hold upon common life; the colors of love and dislike grow paler, as all is said to pale when a long sickness draws to its end, and the soul is near its passing. The surface of the mind dulls like a mirror of silver tarnished; the reflections that once played over it come no more; it is estranged from the old light and the moving images of the world. To one thus inhumanly entreated, all men become as travellers moving in the next room of the inn, arriving and departing, brought nearer or removed by a machinery of unshared indifferent fates. His nature is slowly frozen; a fatal coldness rises in him, as from that icy poison of Nonacris of which it is fabled that Alexander died.

Those contemplating a tour in Spain and Portugal cannot do better than provide themselves with "The Tourist's Spain and Portugal" (Dodd, Mead). The author, Ruth Kedzie Wood, has contrived to pack into her little book a surprising amount of information. This has the merit of being the result of her own researches; nothing seems to have been taken from other guide books. There is full information with regard to steamboats, railways, cab tariffs, history, art, local customs, and many other things of interest to the traveller. In the appendix is a list of recommended hotels. Even timetables are given showing the service rendered between principal points, together with the cost of tickets. In future editions the publishers would do well to correct the too numerous misspellings of foreign words. There are eight of these on page 52 alone. These trivial errors produce a bad impression and mar an otherwise admirable work.

Mr. Arnold Bennett's literary equipment consists principally of an acute observation and a gift of pungent expression. To these qualities must be added a singularly retentive memory, or, if not that, a habit of painstaking notation of impressions. He has little of the reforming zeal of Wells, still less of the romantic fire of Locke. The commonplace world, as he knows it, is, as he might say in the quotation marks that he finds so useful, "not half bad." There was a time, after "Clayhanger" made its appearance, when one thought of him as of one who held the promise of greatness, but of late years Mr. Bennett has settled down to a good workaday pace. It would be an exaggeration to say that he "adorns all that he touches," but at least he has the faculty of making most that he touches interesting. His method of arresting attention becomes at times a trifle mechanical, as might be expected of one who must turn out an almost incredible number of words per annum. The same tricks of style that appear in the novels appear again in "Your United States," and they crop up with even greater frequency in "Paris Nights" (Doran), his latest book of "impressions of places and peoples." It exhibits all Mr. Bennett's defects, but it exhibits his virtues as well. It is a bulky volume of attractive make-up and excellent type, containing a scries of impressions gained in many parts of Europe; and most of it is very readable. At least half of the volume is devoted to his own land, and it is unquestionable that he writes best of what he knows best, which is the English middle classes. After spending a somewhat uninstructive evening with him at the Paris Variétés, or listening while he endeavors to convince himself that his native canniness is in peril of being overset by the meretricious attractions of Monte Carlo, it is a real relief to go with him again to the Potteries which he knows so well, to walk by his side along London's Embankment, or even to spend a day in his company at that North of England holiday inferno, Blackpool. Mr. Bennett's genius is domestic, and not the less admirable on that account, and he is at his best when explaining a mystery like the chronic tepidity of the hot water in the establishment of a "Mr. Smith," where the water, being heated by the kitchen range, is at its hottest at midday on Sunday, when nobody wants it, and at its coldest mornings and evenings, when everybody wants it; or when he is philosophizing on the household trials of "Mrs. Smith," and the problems presented by the case of Matilda, the maid-of-all work. "Paris Nights" is illustrated by E. A. Rickards, whose clever and spirited sketches add much to the attractiveness of the volume.

It is a pleasure to welcome the series of handsome, serviceable volumes which D. B. Updike at the Merrymount Press, Boston, is publishing in the Humanist's Library, edited by Lewis Einstein. The last volume to appear is Albrecht Dürer's "Records of Journeys to Venice and the Low Countries," issued under the editorship of Roger Fry. With the appearance of each number we feel tempted to praise at length the quality of paper, printing, and editing. Such care is not wasted when bestowed upon the large figures of the Renaissance who are the subjects of this rich Library, and is indeed no more than replacing them in the settings to which they were accustomed in their day. In some respects the letters from Venice, written in 1506 to Wilibald Pirkheimer are the most interesting part of the book. They have a touch of gayety which is lacking in the later journal. Dürer enjoys the society of the Venetian painters, at least of some of them. Bellini "has praised me highly to many gentlemen. He would willingly have something of mine, and came himself to me and asked me to do something for him, and said that he would pay well for it. . . . He is very old and yet he is the best painter of all." But some of the artists he calls "faithless, lying, thievish rascals," who are so jealous of him that they threaten his life. Dürer describes his one lesson in dancing and vows that it shall not be repeated, owing to the expense and his ineptness; he tells of precious stones and Greek books he has collected for Pirkheimer, and twits him on his loves, in the last instance furnishing a humorous drawing.

At the time of his journey to the Netherlands, 1520-1521, Dürer enjoyed an assured reputation and was on friendliest terms with Flemish painters. Yet we hear all too little of them on the personal side, rather too much space being given to the state of his finances. On one occasion he paid one stiver for a bath; on another he gave an attentive servant ten stivers as a tip, etc. There is one glowing passage based on rumors concerning Luther:

> On the Friday before Whitsuntide, 1521, tidings came to me at Antwerp that Martin Luther had been treacherously taken prisoner, for he trusted the Emperor Charles's herald, who had been granted to him with the Imperial safe conduct. . . . Immediately there appeared ten knights, who treacherously carried off the pious man, who had been betrayed; a man enlightened by the Holy Ghost, a follower of Christ and of the true Christian faith, and whether he lives yet or whether they have put him to death, I know not. If he has suffered, it is for the sake of Christian truth and because he has fought with the un-Christ-like papacy, which strives with its heavy load of human laws against the redemption of Christ.

He records a dinner with Erasmus, but without comment. Altogether, the journal gives the impression of a man somewhat conscious of his fame, yet of one who is painting quite as much for the money there is in it as for his love of it. The translation has been done by Rudolph Tombo. W. A. Dwiggins furnishes an attractive title-page, and Mr. Fry's introduction gives a comprehensive summary of Dürer's artistic achievements.

The artist who can write his own descriptive text and make the story of his travels as charming as his pictures is a rare person. At last one of his kind has visited the West Coast of South America, and the result is most satisfactory. A couple of years ago Ernest Peixotto took his sketch-book from Panama to Lima, Mollendo, Cuzco, and La Paz; then, retracing his steps, went up the Pacific Coast via Acapulco to the Golden Gate. The result is a delightful volume called "Pacific Shores from Panama" (Scribner), reminding one of Hopkinson Smith's ability to acquire accurate information, put it into pleasant English, and illustrate it with charming sketches. Mr. Peixotto has gone a step further, and, instead of limiting himself to somewhat disconnected travel essays, has told the whole story of his journey in an intimate manner. He makes no pretence at erudition or scholarship. There is no index, and the map is redolent of the era of the buccaneers. His volume is essentially of the gift-book type, and yet it is more than that, for the text of richly illustrated gift books is rarely as interesting and as trustworthy as in the present case. There are remarkably few misstatements. The author has succeeded also in catching that elusive will-o'-the-wisp "atmosphere." To those who are familiar with the West Coast the volume will be welcome, because it contains so many of those fleeting artistic scenes which the traveller's camera fails to get. While for those to whom the West Coast is still a terra incognita one could not wish a happier fate than that they should be introduced to the hospitable shores of Peru through the delightfully graphic pages of Mr. Peixotto.

"Rambles in Autograph Land" (Putnam), by Adrian H. Joline, is, as it were, the literary testament of a disappearing type of enthusiast. Autographs—meaning, of course, letters or literary manuscripts; Mr. Joline scorned the collecting of mere signatures—are on the one hand the trophies of a fascinating kind of hunt; on the other the clues to historic personalities. About half the book is given up to general considerations on collecting, the other half is a running commentary on Mr. Joline's own autograph collections with many facsimiles. Here whim rules supreme. The writers were so vivid to Mr. Joline that he patted them on the back, abused them, derided them, lauded them to the skies, as the mood demanded. Sometimes the comment is charmingly mellow, again tiresomely lengthy or crudely testy. Altogether it is a readable jumble, and an interesting memorial of a sturdy personality, but lightness of touch, the saving grace of such abiblia, is absent. One finds oneself reading along chiefly for tidbits like this from Frederick Locker-Lampson to Miss Collins, a poet's daughter, with a gift of earrings: "I am very glad you like the earrings. How is it that, your father being a poet, you never have had your ears bored?"

On the occasion of the first general meeting of the session of the Society for the Promotion of Hellenic Studies, held in the rooms of the Society of Antiquaries, Burlington House, London, Mr. Ellis H. Minns read an important paper on certain Greek documents of the first century B. C., recently found in Western Media. Mr. Minns explained that the documents—three in number—were preserved out of a collection from near Avroman. The first and second were in Greek, but the third, which has not yet been deciphered, was probably in Pehlevi. The fact that the first two were written in Greek was interesting, because non-Egyptian was rare. It went to prove, what had been suspected by archæologists for some time past, namely, the existence of a strong element of Hellenism in the most eastern portion of the Seleucid empire. With regard to the contents of the documents, they were both conveyances of a vineyard called Dadbakabag. Each is, according to an ancient custom, in duplicate, the "close" version being tied up and sealed by the witnesses to prevent any tampering with it, the "patent" version, usually the fuller, being accessible. The dating formulæ give the titles of the Parthian Kings. One is of the time of Mithradates II, the other from the reign of Phraates IV. The names of the queens follow, three of Mithradates, two his sisters, the other a daughter of Tigranes; four of Phraates, including a Cleopatra, but not naming Musa. The place names are all unknown.

The death is reported from England of William Prideaux Courtney, who had a solid reputation especially as a biographer. He did considerable work for the "Dictionary of National Biography," and published a number of scholarly books, among them "Register of National Bibliography," 3 vols, "The Secrets of Our National Literature," and "Dodsley's Collection of Poetry."

CHILDREN'S BOOKS.

This season, it is well worth the parents' while to examine the delightful reprint of Anatole France's "Girls and Boys" (Duffield)—a book rendered distinctive by the charming color-plates of Boutet de Monvel. The text is full of that understanding of child life which will fascinate the grown reader, and gain the immediate sympathy of the young. The illustrations are by a master hand of simple line and color. The French has been feelingly translated. Altogether the combination is refreshing.

"Mother Goose" (Century) consists of a judicious selection of some of the old nursery rhymes, compiled and illustrated by Arthur Rackham. Each page is a clear example of well-placed type and wide margin, while the line drawings are among the best Mr. Rackham has done.

"Gulliver's Travels" (Harper) belongs to a series embracing such other well-known classics as "Robin Hood," "The Swiss Family Robinson," and "Tom Brown's School Days." It is introduced in the right spirit by W. D. Howells, and the illustrations by Louis Rhead, imitative of wood-cuts, convey an admirable idea of the marvels, large and small, which crowd this "supreme" story.

A companion to last year's "Treasure Island" is the present edition of Stevenson's "Kidnapped" (Scribner), with pictures by the same artist, N. C. Wyeth. It is difficult to find a more adventurous-looking volume, with the essential action of the story heightened by colored illustrations as piratical as they are dramatic.

An edition of similar artistic proportions is "Tales from Washington Irving's Traveller" (Lippincott), illustrated in color by George Hood, whose method is a combination of Howard Pyle's and Maxfield Parrish's. But the pictures are disappointing both in imaginative conception and in pictorial effect.

Once more is "The Arabian Nights" (Holt) subjected to selection and overhauling, this time by the judicious hand of Frances Jenkins Olcott, formerly supervisor of children's work in the Pittsburgh Carnegie Library. A brief preface indicates her excellent taste in using the same version, and her conscientious efforts to preserve as much of the original as lies within juvenile understanding. Several unfamiliar stories are included. Whatever the decorative format of "The Arabian Nights," there is not quite that flavor which the old-time wood-cut gave of men with baggy trousers and women with veiled faces.

An imported edition of Hawthorne's "Tanglewood Tales" is sent forth by the T. Y. Crowell Company. This has been thoroughly illustrated by the English artist, George Soper.

It is interesting to note a tendency on the part of children's literature to follow lines similar to adult fiction. We have had many novelized dramas within recent years. This season finds two well-known plays converted into stories for the young. When Maeterlinck's "Blue Bird" was produced at the New Theatre, while it was not regarded strictly as a play for children, at least it contained much child interest in it, and did, in fact, attract numberless young folk. It may even be safely conjectured that they caught the meaning of many of the mystic scenes. But Madame Maeterlinck has evidently thought there was room for the "Children's Blue Bird" (Dodd, Mead), a daintily bound, fat-looking volume, with pictures by Herbert Paus, rather than photograph scenes from the stage production. Much descriptive matter is used, with here and there a sprinkling of dialogue.

Florence Yates Hann has been more original in converting Rostand's "Chanticleer" into a kind of La Fontaine fable for children (Stokes). The work has been done in a skilful fashion, for, instead of rewriting the story, a straight narrative on the order of a minute synopsis has been made, with much relish of humor and much use of satire. Wherever the dialogue has been translated it has been done colloquially and well. Many a grown person will relish this juvenile book for the spirited manner in which the incidents have been utilized. The pictures by J. A. Shepherd are unfailingly in accord with the uniqueness and wisdom of the text. On its own merit the book deserves success.

"The Strange Story Book" (Longmans) is the last volume to receive the editorial care of Andrew Lang. It therefore contains a portrait of this caterer to childhood's folklore, and an introduction by Mrs. Lang telling something of the twenty-five years' service bestowed on the compilation of the many-hued series of story books. We have no reason to change our views regarding the use of ethnological matter for children whose time would be better spent with Grimm and Andersen. As usual, the outward garb of this volume is handsome.

To one reading "The White Duckling and Other Tales" (Crowell), translated by Nathan Haskell Dole, there may be some added zest in the fact that the stories have been collected by the Czar himself for the amusement of the Imperial children. Certain it is that the pictures by Bilibin are rich in color and imagination, at the same time that they are very Russian. This is a reissue of what has hitherto been known as "The Russian Fairy Book."

Emilie Kip Baker's "Stories of Old Greece and Rome" (Macmillan) is an excellent combination of mythology and literature. We are sadly wanting these days in a knowledge of Olympia, and as incapable of understanding allusion to the gods and goddesses as we are of placing Biblical references. The author has wisely compiled an appendix wherein poetic references are given, so that the reader may be accustomed to associate the names with literature. For example, after reading the story of Prometheus, told in a simple and agreeable manner, we are referred to Æschylus's "Prometheus Bound," Shelley's "Prometheus Unbound," and to the poems on Prometheus by Longfellow and Lowell. Here is a Christmas gift that is a tonic for the weak imagination of the modern child.

"The Pipes of Clovis" (Little, Brown), written with freshness of style by Grace Duffie Boylan, is an interesting story of legendary character. Its hero is a forester's son who can play upon his pipes such music as to lure to him the beasts and birds of the land. Fortunate also that the lad discovers how to draw towards him all horses near and far, for a time arrives when his Queen is threatened by the Huns. The barbarians soon overflow the land, and this hero of ours, mounted upon a wild horse, whose feet are touched with magic swiftness, pipes the enemy out of the country and saves the day. A very holding story is this, and one above the ordinary.

The "Children's Book of Christmas Stories" (Doubleday, Page) has been compiled by Ada M. Skinner and Asa Don Dickinson to supply a want in the library. The frontispiece is that delightful color print by John Leech of Mr. Fezziwig's Ball in Dickens's "Christmas Carol." In the table of contents we find many old friends—as many as the law of copyright would allow.

Poetry is slimly represented this season. What there is of it, however, is of a marked kind. Frances Jenkins Olcott has compiled what she calls an anthology of "Story Telling Poems" (Houghton Mifflin), selected for story-telling and reading aloud, as well as for the children's own reading. There are many fables, myths, legends, tales, romantic or historical in treatment, so the editor argues, which, told in rhythmic form, are so logical in manner as to render it easy to retell the plots. Take, for instance, the sad career of "Augustus who would not have any Soup," as detailed by Dr. Heinrich Hoffman: the story possibilities in it are as striking as those in Campbell's "Lord Ullin's Daughter," in Cowper's "John Gilpin," and in Browning's "Pied Piper." For the benefit of those teachers who would emphasize the ethics in each poem, a subject index has been made. This is a judiciously planned little book, and no child could have a more competent guide than Miss Olcott.

E. Boyd Smith is an artist very much in demand. He seems to be the official illustrator for Houghton Mifflin. For a very richly manufactured edition of Scott's "Ivanhoe," he has done a number of colored full pages—pale in tint but sufficiently chivalric in conception. This volume exemplifies the belief that, given a popular exterior, Scott will be read as often as ever he was. The grown-up editions are much too severe in format and in paragraphing.

Peace-loving parents will frown upon H. G. Wells for writing "Little Wars" (Small, Maynard), but we personally cannot but delight in the science of warfare which he has reduced to terms of the nursery floor. Last year we hailed his "Floor Games" as much because they opened an infinite field of association between father and child as because they were delightfully described.

Soldiers of tin and lead and wood, weapons such as an elastic garter, a pea-shooter, a rubber ball—and an untrammelled floor! Follow the rules of the game as Mr. Wells frames them, and you will have an exciting round of military tactics and strategy—what he calls "tin murder." It is to be hoped that squeamish parents will not let their children miss such fun.

The more conventional type of book now claims our notice—the book of advice, more practical than Cobbett's sanctimonious guidance, less biographical than Smiles's "Self-Help." Lily R. Foxcraft has written the typical commonplaces in "While You Are a Girl" (Pilgrim). The text is perfect enough in its model attitude to turn the saintliest young person bad. Mrs. Christine Terhune Herrick's "My Boy and I" (Dana Estes) is better, and is tempered with a sense of humor. She particularly addresses the mother who has not yet realized that the son has a definite place in the household—the right to have his friends and to cultivate his interests.

There is only a step from being to doing in our present-day children's literature. That is why A. Russell Bond's "With Men Who Do Things" (Munn) will particularly appeal to the ambitious boy. For it discusses all the engineering activities to be seen in or near a city, and one gets a clear idea of many of the marvels occurring right before our eyes. Unfortunately, the romance of skyscrapers, of foundation building, of water tunnelling, and other similar activities is marred by an artificial story dealing with two boys who witness the wonders described.

Robert Fulton, Engineer and Artist: His Life and Works. By H. W. Dickinson. New York: John Lane & Co. $3 net.

This biography has been written to do justice to a famous inventor, who has, perhaps, been overestimated by American biographers, and has not received proper credit from English writers. When it is recalled that Fulton spent some of the most important years of his life in England, it is not so surprising that we should be indebted at last to an English writer for an impartial survey of his life.

Fulton's life in England as an artist is considered carefully, as it was a period of great influence on his character. Mr. Dickinson evidently believes that he abandoned his profession and turned suddenly to that of engineering because of the conviction that he could never become more than a respectable artist. His American biographers are prone to give the impression that Fulton at once became a successful engineer and inventor. But Mr. Dickinson's analysis of the work of these years shows it rather as a foundation for future attainments. Exceedingly fertile in ideas though he might be, he needed time to learn what others had done.

Fulton's real work began in his long visit to France. Perceiving that war was the chief occupation of the country, he conceived the idea of attacking ships with submarines armed with explosives which could be attached to the hulls of vessels. Mr. Dickinson's account of the long endeavor to perfect the submarine is most interesting, and the appreciation of Fulton's genius in this invention, of his scientific spirit, and of his daring and surprising success in building and operating his submarines, is accurate and just. Fulton's persistence was indefatigable, and, though a foreigner and unknown, he managed to hold the attention of officials of all ranks, and even finally interested Napoleon, who not only appointed so eminent a commission as Volney, Monge, and Laplace to report on the invention, but also gave a grant of money and offered an opportunity to try his "torpedoes" against the English ships.

Then, just as Fulton's hopes were highest, came the bitter disappointment of neglect and dismissal. Mr. Dickinson gives as the probable reason for this action of Napoleon, the conviction that, however brilliant the experiment, it was only an experiment. He says:

> Napoleon was ready and anxious to employ any means known to science to further his ends, but it was no part of his policy to take up anything that had not been put into practice successfully. He allowed Fulton to work out his invention just to that point where he could judge whether or not it would be of use to him, and having convinced himself that it could not, dropped the matter without hesitation. And he was right; Fulton's series of experiments, brilliant though they were, only showed that until a motor could be developed capable of working under the restrictions imposed, further progress was impracticable. For this development the world had to wait many years longer.

The remainder of Fulton's life was spent on the problem of steam navigation, which he was destined to solve so brilliantly. Disgusted with the failure of his submarines, he must undoubtedly have felt that the great need for such boats was something better than muscular power to propel them. Thus his failure led him to his great work. With undiminished energy he obtained the financial aid of Chancellor Livingston and plunged into the designing and building of a steamboat. After many mishaps, the public trial of the first steamboat took place on the river Seine. Mr. Dickinson could find only a brief reference to it in one of the Paris newspapers, which recorded that, "On the 21st Thermidor (9th August, 1803) a trial was made of a new invention, of which the complete and brilliant success should have important consequences for the commerce and internal navigation of France. . . ."

But Fulton and Livingston had no intention of remaining in France; they were looking forward to the sure reward which awaited them in America. Fulton soon left for England, where he acquainted himself with what English engineers were doing and where he obtained from Boulton and Watts an engine for his boat. At last, after nineteen years of absence, he returned to his native land and finished his life-work. Mr. Dickinson gives Fulton ample credit for the way in which he met and overcame obstacles of all kinds, but he sets rather undue emphasis on his executive ability, which withdraws the attention from his inventive originality. He thinks that the English were so far advanced in steam engineering that it could have been but a few years before they would have solved the problem. But the same can be said of almost any invention, and the fact is that English engineers had tried and failed, whereas Fulton succeeded. Fulton's calculations and plans, as presented by Mr. Dickinson himself, are the most convincing evidence of Fulton's inventive genius.

From the days of "Wake-Robin," which John Burroughs wrote while a government clerk in Washington, to "The Summit of the Years" (Houghton Mifflin), his latest volume of essays, is a matter of above four decades—decades stretching back into that Mid-Victorian era of complacency, propriety, and signal achievement, and forward into this age of science of which Mr. Burroughs confesses that he, too, at times feels "the weary weight." His latest book differs little from his first. The new vintage is, all things considered, quite as good as the older ones, for if it leaves one somewhat more solemn, one enjoys nevertheless the old mingled tranquillity and exhilaration. The first essay, in the author's most confidential and at the same time most urbane mood, contains an Emersonian sentence that summarizes a large part of Mr. Burroughs's philosophy: "What I meet in life, in my walks, or in my travels, which is akin to me, or in the line of my interests and sympathies, that sticks to me like a burr, or, better than that, like the food I eat." Another essay, "In the Noon of Science," marks a shift in emphasis since the author's previous volume, "Time and Change," in which science was conceived as tending to crush out religion and poetry; now, the fault turns out to be ours—we, not science, are found wanting, for where is that "mental robustness, or spiritual joy and vigor, that enables one to transmute and spiritualize science"? (Perhaps, after all, the scientific spirit has spirited it away.) Although "science and poetry go hand in hand" in that "they transform and illuminate the common," life in America is "undoubtedly the ugliest and most materialistic that any country or age ever saw." Verily, Mr. Burroughs is cheerful rather than cheering.

A large section of Mr. Burroughs's book—five or six of the fourteen essays—is given up to a highly repetitious discussion of the animal mind. Relying on the term "instinct," even though the "new psychology" is inclined to avoid the word, Mr. Burroughs stoutly maintains, as he has maintained for years, that "we reason for the brute"; and he professes scant interest in the laboratory study of animal psychology. He entertains, indeed, a general suspicion of elaborate paraphernalia, of "pother and appliances and tiresome calculations," and exclaims (as he well may): "With what desperate thoroughness the new men study the birds."

From Mr. Burroughs's essays, and from most "nature books," Dr. Townsend's "Sand Dunes and Salt Marshes" (Dana Estes) differs in being a sober account, in the manner of Gilbert White, of the innumerable interesting phenomena which the Massachusetts coast, particularly at Ipswich, has disclosed to the author in almost forty years. Half of the dozen chapters deal with the changes in the formation of dunes, and with the birds and flora and the harbor seal that are characteristic of the Ipswich dunes; most of the other half are devoted to a similar study of salt marshes. This book one may well find refreshing, as Lowell found Gibbon, through the writer's "honest incapacity of imagination." It contains an index, and is heavily loaded with illustrations from photographs.

A writer of conspicuously less hard sense than either of the foregoing is Stanton Davis Kirkham, whose somewhat trivial view of nature is again exemplified in "North and South" (Putnam). Despite the title, the book is not complementary to the author's "East and West," in which both North and South were already amply represented. Moreover, the mode of treatment is dissimilar, since in the present volume two localities are studied, and in the earlier volume about a dozen. The two places are Pine Bank in western New York, where the writer spends his summers, and Milford in South Carolina, whither he goes each winter to "be with my friends the birds." Mr. Kirkham's theory is that each part of our country has a delightful "atmosphere," or "spirit," which is unique, an atmosphere that is expressed by certain trees and birds, such as the white pine and the Carolina wren, and that it behooves us, as loyal citizens and true images of God, to have fellowship with these atmospheres. Every part of the country has its peculiar fascination; imagine Mr. Kirkham exclaiming with Mr. Burroughs, "Oh, the flat, featureless, monotonous, cornstalk-littered Middle West!" Though his writing sometimes has charm, the following sentence is only a little worse than others: "To truly associate with plants and birds means to completely lend one's self to them, to frequent their haunts almost as they do themselves."

The latest style in the out-of-doors life seems to prescribe an open barn door. Mr. Burroughs's essay entitled "A Barn-Door Outlook" begins: "I have a barn-door outlook because I have a hay-barn study, and I chose a hay-barn study because I wanted a barn-door outlook." We should not, therefore, be shocked by the novelty of the title of Mr. W. P. Eaton's book, "Barn Doors and Byways" (Small, Maynard), whatever we may think of the jocund but unlovely "Gift Book" binding in gold and milk white. It is worth noting that, whereas Mr. Burroughs desires his barn-door outlook in order that he may have "a wide, near view," Mr. Eaton desires his in order to have his scenery properly framed—"there was the picture, perfectly composed, the soul of the pasture caught." Mr. Eaton insists that he is not a naturalist, and that "a great deal of gush is written about birds," and he wisely confines himself to vivacious description and reminiscence. Though devoid of intellectual weight and emotional intensity, his essays are very agreeable reading on account of the vividness of the pictures which he carefully composes for us, and of the sensations and sentiments aroused in him by roads and rivers, harbors and swamps, abandoned farms, and Berkshire winters. The illustrations—drawings by Walter King Stone—are for the most part capital, and are thoroughly in accord with the mood of the book.

"The Stars and Their Stories" (Holt), by Alice Griffith, is a book for young people, containing an excellent collection of star-lore, with much likelihood of reflex helpfulness to literature as well as science. The author would seem to have brought together comprehensively from every source, excerpting widely and wisely; and her pen collaborator, Margaret Burroughs, has aided greatly in visualizing the asterisms referred to. Here and there a classic painting is introduced, with a few technical photographs; and at the end are maps of mid-latitude skies, though far from being as good as they ought to be. We have Addison and Aratus, Browning and Bryant, Carlyle and Catullus; also Hood and Hawthorne, Lowell and Longfellow, Taylor and Turner, with Richard Proctor and Edward Everett not neglected, the dignified address of the last named at the dedication of the Dudley Observatory in Albany half a century ago being appropriately adapted. Here, too, is Macaulay's "Battle of Lake Regillus," a much too lengthy lay sung at the feast in honor of Castor and Pollux. The interesting little book concludes with Galileo's account of his first telescope, translated from the Sidereus Nuncius, and cannot fail to turn starward old and young alike.

Sir Robert Stawell Ball, Lowndean professor of astronomy and geometry at Cambridge University, England, and for the last twenty-one years director of the Cambridge Observatory, died last week in London. He was born in Dublin in 1840, son of Robert Ball, a well-known naturalist, and was educated at Abbott's Grange, Chester, and at Trinity College, Dublin. He devoted himself throughout his college course to mathematical and physical studies, and graduated in 1861 as university student in mathematics. In 1867 he was appointed to the chair of applied mathematics in the Royal College of Science, just established in Dublin, and in 1868 director of the Science and Art Museum in that city. He became a fellow of the Royal Society in 1873, and professor of astronomy in the University of Dublin and royal astronomer of Ireland in 1874, which posts he held until 1892, when he was chosen for the Cambridge chair. He was made scientific adviser to the Commissioner of Irish Lights in 1884, and at various times he was president of the Royal Astronomical Society, of the Mathematical Association, and of the Royal Zoölogical Society of Ireland. He received the degree of LL.D. from Dublin, and was knighted in 1886 by Queen Victoria. Sir Robert visited America in 1901-02 and again in 1907. On the first visit he delivered a series of lectures under the direction of the late Major J. B. Pond, and lectured also at several universities and before various learned societies. He published many memoirs on mathematical, astronomical, and physical subjects, and the following works on astronomy: "A Treatise on Spherical Astronomy," "The Story of the Heavens," "Starland," "In Starry Realms," "In the High Heavens," "Time and Tide," "The Earth's Beginning," and "Popular Guide to the Heavens."

Drama

Thoughts and After-Thoughts. By Herbert Beerbohm Tree. New York: Funk & Wagnalls Co. $1.50 net.

This is a clever, witty, and entertaining book, but it is also disingenuous, because, in maintaining its particular thesis, it studiously ignores, or misrepresents, the chief argument of its opponents. Professing to deal with many topics, the one object of it is to justify the system of spectacular production of Shakespearean and other classic plays adopted by the author, the well-known manager of His Majesty's Theatre, in London, and to establish his claim to be regarded as the leading living interpreter and preserver of the poetic drama. The points of his own brief, scattered through various chapters, may be summarized as follows: Starting from the proposition that Shakespeare is not for an age, but for all time, he argues that he must be considered not only as an ancient but a modern author, and that therefore his works are entitled to whatever illusionary advantage may be conferred upon them by the latest devices of modern theatrical illustrative art. He quotes passages from the speeches of Chorus in "Henry V"—with a curious misapprehension of their actual drift—to show that Shakespeare bemoaned the absence of such appliances. What he meant, of course, was that all such defects must and might be supplied by the imagination. Sir Herbert holds that it is easier to believe in ships and armies, the splendors of pageantry, etc., when you can see them. As for the cutting and transposition of the text, that he asserts—not without plausibility—must have been common in Shakespeare's own day. Certainly, it is true that in doing this he has only followed authoritative precedent. Furthermore, he contends that the text itself, of which the most vital parts are scrupulously respected, is reinforced by this illuminative treatment. Upon mere literary enthusiasts—idealists as he calls them—who are in favor of a modest or "adequate" scenic equipment for such masterworks, he pours out all the vials of his contempt. Finally—and he seems to think it an unanswerable argument—he adduces his box-office receipts as evidence that the mass of public opinion is on his side.

Now, much of this, or even all of it, may be true, but none of it touches the real issue. There are, of course, those who believe that the sublimest creations of Shakespeare's genius can be enjoyed best in the closet. They may be left out of the question. Among theatre-goers, even of the most intelligent sort, very few object to scenery in itself, or would deny the possibility of its aid to illusion. What the real Shakespeare-lover—not necessarily a deep student—does object to most vehemently, is the unnecessary elaboration of scenery at the expense of the text and the art of acting, which it is the prime function and privilege of the theatre to foster and develop. Herein lies the gist of the charge which the most competent critics, since the days of Charles Kean, the first actor-manager who used the glitter of tinsel to blind the eyes of his patrons to his histrionic deficiencies, have preferred against his successors and imitators, including Sir Herbert Tree. And it is this vital nub of the whole matter that our essayist most carefully avoids. He discourses, with much glib unction, of the glories of his art, of the archæological and historical value of his pictorial decorations and his triumphant materialization of poetic visions, but concerning the acting, the actual interpretation of the plays themselves, he preserves, possibly from motives of modesty, a discreet silence. And yet, when the honor, and popularization, of Shakespeare is the aim, this is the all-important point. Sir Herbert himself, presumably, if pressed, would admit so much. This axiom granted, it follows, as a natural and inevitable corollary, that, in every Shakespearean production conducted on sound artistic principles, the principal character should be entrusted to the actor most capable of interpreting it. Sir Herbert, therefore, in protesting that his policy is the right one, virtually asserts his own preëminence as the interpreter of Hamlet, Othello, Macbeth, Shylock, and Falstaff. This claim, to say the least, is not supported by the bulk of the best critical opinion. It is only fair to add that in this arbitrary and egotistical preëmption of the most conspicuous parts he has simply followed the system of which he is so ardent an advocate. Incidentally, he has also touched upon its most obvious and mischievous fallacy. The very stress that he lays upon the attractive powers of spectacle suggests an uneasy suspicion that his success has been managerial rather than Shakespearean. And this has always been the verdict of the best equipped jurors.

With respect to the "illusion" upon which he insists so persistently, it may be remarked that of this quality there are two kinds in the theatre, the merely visual, which is created by costumes and pictures, and the intellectual and emotional, which is established by veracious and inspired acting, and which is virtually independent of scenic artifice. It is of the latter, of course, that Shakespeare speaks. What has been the chief source of illusion at His Majesty's, the acting of Sir Herbert or its gorgeous background? Unfortunately, no analysis of box-office figures can answer that query. But of what Shakespearean character has Sir Herbert been generally acknowledged as the best living representative, and which of his representations has been commended especially for its Shakespearean spirit? His book provokes these interrogations. How does his work as a Shakespearean devotee compare with that of F. R. Benson, who has produced, throughout the length and breadth of Great Britain, for thirty years, nearly all the plays of the poet, in the miserably "adequate" method to which Sir Herbert is so superior—maintaining, meanwhile, a practical dramatic school which has supplied the English stage with nearly all the rising young actors on whom the hope of a future theatrical revival rests? He has never found sumptuous adornment necessary to the creation of illusion or the reinforcement of the text. An actor and a student, not a showman, knowing that the play is the thing, he abjures excesses in upholstery, saves as much as possible of the written word, and demonstrates the modernity of "Hamlet" by giving it, in his simple fashion, without cuts or transpositions, and drawing appreciative audiences. It is men like Benson, William Poel, the Greets, and Granville Barker who best serve the cause of Shakespeare.

In the Masterpieces of English Drama (American Book Co.) has appeared "Philip Massinger," edited by Lucius A. Sherman, of the University of Nebraska. The small volume contains "The Roman Actor," "The Maid of Honor," "A New Way to Pay Old Debts," and "Believe As You List," together with a competent introduction, notes, and glossary.

Israel Zangwill has recently finished a three-act play, to which he has given the title "Plaster Saints." The chief issues are of a grave character, but their seriousness is leavened by an element of comedy. The piece has been acquired by Gaston Mayer, who hopes to produce it at a London West End theatre early in the coming year.

The Bushey Repertory Theatre has begun operations in England, with a programme consisting of three pieces, "The Dark Lady of the Sonnets," by Bernard Shaw; "The Unseen Helmsman," by Miss Laurence Alma-Tadema, and "The Maharani of Arakan," by Rabindranath Tagore and George Calderon. Two further performances are promised during the season, apart from meetings, debates, and lectures, while Arthur Bourchier has offered the use of the Garrick for a matinée. The Birmingham Repertory Theatre also is making a fresh start with "Candida" and "The Critic," and a lecture by John Drinkwater on the subject of "Repertory Theatres."

Arthur Bourchier has procured a piece, in four acts, by Herr Paul Lindau, entitled "Der Anderer." A French adaptation, called "Le Procureur Hallers," is at the Théâtre Antoine. Although there is a certain similarity between the main idea of "Der Anderer" and that of "Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde," the story, its incidents, and characters are widely different from those in Robert Louis Stevenson's book. Moreover, Herr Lindau's play ends happily, in marked contrast to the tragic conclusion of Stevenson's story.

Music

Chopin the Composer. By Edgar Stillman Kelley. New York: G. Schirmer. $1.60.

Chamber Music. By Thomas E. Dunhill. New York: Macmillan & Co. $3.20 net.

In the field of musical literature Mr. Kelley's volume on Chopin is the most original and valuable book of the year; in some respects, moreover, it is the most important of all the monographs on this great and popular composer. Time was when the learned musicians condescendingly patted Chopin on the back as a writer of pleasing drawing-room pieces of the better sort, who, to be sure, indulged in daring feats and irregularities that deserved censure. The eminent German critic, Rellstab, found him "inexhaustible in his ear-splitting discords, forced transitions, harsh modulations, ugly distortions of melody and rhythm." Others conceived of his pieces as being the result of a mental condition akin to the morbid process in a mollusk which yields pearls. An English critic declared that Chopin's sojourn in Paris "exerted a salutary influence on his art, inasmuch as it toned down his Arabian howl." Others of the wise men admitted the subtle charm of his music, but denied that it had any scientific basis; one of these critics being Niecks, Chopin's most elaborate biographer. A prominent virtuoso spoke to Mr. Kelley of Chopin as the greatest composer for the piano, adding: "But, of course, he was no musician like Brahms."

This general estimate of Chopin afforded a striking illustration of the academic superstition that science and charm of style are incompatible. Liszt was the first to divine that Chopin's music was intellectual as well as sensuous and emotional; that its harmonic tissue was "both original and erudite"; that his works mark "an epoch in the formation of style"; that one might advantageously "dissect his magnificent pages, which afford so rich a field for scientific observation." He did not, however, himself undertake this task, and it has remained for Mr. Kelley to do it. No one could be better qualified, for he is not only one of America's foremost and most erudite composers, but he has the gift of expressing himself clearly. His theme is the structural art of Chopin and its influence on contemporaneous composers. While others have hinted at these things, Mr. Kelley is the first who does not content himself with brief remarks, but discusses the topic thoroughly, citing passage after passage, in parallel columns, as it were, to prove his assertions.

All music composed since the thirties and forties of the last century shows, Mr. Kelley is convinced, Chopin's influence, either directly or indirectly. Even Wagner is not an exception; he admired what he called the "equipoise of means and ends" in Chopin as much as he did in Palestrina or in Mozart, and the examples cited by Mr. Kelley show beyond a doubt that he was strongly influenced by the chromatic progressions of Chopin; indeed, Wagner's "kinship to the Polish master is as evident as his relationship to Beethoven."

Particularly interesting and novel are Mr. Kelley's remarks on Chopin's attitude towards the orchestra. He is commonly supposed to have been almost a bungler in this department of composition, but in truth he actually anticipated some fine orchestral effects of the future, as when he added a trombone to the score of his E minor concerto—"an unheard-of procedure in concerted music." With plausible ingenuity Mr. Kelley makes it seem probable that the main reason why Chopin wrote so little for the orchestra was that the intensely chromatic character of his music made it unavailable for that purpose till chromatic horns and trumpets had been introduced by Wagner.

While this is more or less conjectural, Mr. Kelley establishes beyond a doubt that Chopin not only mastered the sonata form, but contributed fresh and important elements, opened new vistas, and introduced features which greatly increased the difficulty of treatment, as compared with the simple melodic curves of the classical school. "So absolutely did Chopin absorb the spirit of the sonata, so completely did he acquaint himself with every device known to the craft, that all his greater works became sonatafied." These great works are coming more and more to the front. Among them are the mazurkas, which have not been heretofore as popular as the valses, chiefly because of their exotic accents and harmonies. When Paderewski or Hofmann plays one of these mazurkas it mystifies audiences as much as it enchants them by its exotic, orchid-like features. Mr. Kelley devotes several pages to showing how Chopin was one of the first of the moderns to introduce novel harmonic effects by using the old Ionian, Dorian, Phrygian, Lydian, and other modes, thus anticipating Debussy.

Attention should be called to one more of Mr. Kelley's theses, which is important as a corrective of the general tendency of professional musicians to accept German art as the world-language and to look on all other music as lacking universality. The author shows how Chopin manifested Polish, French, Italian, German, and Oriental traits, "thus enabling him, in a certain sense, to speak a more universal tone language than Bach or Beethoven."

It would have been well if the author of "Chamber Music" could have read and digested Mr. Kelley's great book before he wrote his own. Like many, if not most, professionals, he labors under the delusion that perfect form in music is a German specialty. Chopin wrote a trio and a sonata for piano and violoncello which have never been surpassed for musical beauty, but Mr. Dunhill does not even refer to them. Another master of form and style, Grieg, is cited in these pages chiefly to show how not to do it (from the German point of view). These shortcomings, however, should not prevent students from consulting this volume. German masters undoubtedly did contribute the bulk of the world's best chamber music, and of this Mr. Dunhill gives an excellent account, taking up in succession the string quartet, the string trio, quintet, sextet, etc.; strings with piano; wind instruments, and larger combinations approximating orchestral size but not too large to be played in a private room. Of timely interest is the chapter on wind instruments, as this species of chamber music is coming more into favor every year. While intended chiefly for writers of chamber music, listeners will find much in these pages a knowledge of which will increase their pleasure in listening to concerts.

The conductor who did more than any one else to educate Parisians to like Wagner got the money he needed for teaching them from his father-in-law, a wealthy manufacturer of a hair tonic. One is reminded of this by the appointment of a new director of the Paris Grand Opera, Jacques Rouché, who has made a fortune by the manufacture of perfumery. He will doubtless be called upon to draw on his bank account, notwithstanding the $160,000 which the Opera gets from the Government annually; for, apart from "Faust" and "Carmen," there are hardly any operas, excepting some of Wagner's, that pay their own way in Paris. The latest manager to discover this is Gabriel Astruc, who has decided to close his new Théâtre des Champs-Elysées because of his deficits. At first everything went well. Russian singers and dancers drew large audiences last spring. It was hoped that the production of neglected operas, such as Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini," Weber's "Freischütz," Rossini's "Barber of Seville," and Moussorgsky's "Boris Godounoff," would keep the ball rolling, but it didn't. Wagner's operas would no doubt have helped, but they have not been available, as the copyright does not expire till January.

The youthful prodigy, Erich Wolfgang Korngold, whose compositions have, within a short space of time, found a hearing in all parts of the musical world, and the quality of whose indisputable talent is still a matter of general discussion, has recently published a new piano and violin sonata that was played a short time ago in Vienna by two prominent artists, Flesch and Schnabel. Very pretentious, monstrously difficult, and inordinately long, the general impression it left behind was of tedium, however flattering the rapturous applause may have been, part of which may, perhaps, be set down to spontaneous enthusiasm, but part, also, to the consideration for the boy's father, the leading critic of the leading Austrian paper.

Work has begun in San Francisco on the construction of a million-dollar music hall which will seat 11,000 persons, and be headquarters for a "continuous music festival" during the time of the Panama Exposition. There will be pageants, orchestral concerts, folk-lore concerts, interstate and international competitions, and other entertainments, prominent among which will be a Welsh Eisteddfod. Prizes are offered for choral and instrumental works.

Prof. Ellsworth C. Phelps, teacher of music in the public schools of Brooklyn, died on Saturday at the age of eighty-six. He was the composer of more than five hundred pieces of music, including "Hiawatha," a symphony in five movements; "Emancipation Symphony," a light opera entitled "David," and thirty or more orchestral compositions.

Adolf Schlösser, who is dead in his eighty-third year, was a pianist of considerable note, and for many years a professor at the Royal Academy of Music, London. He composed chamber-music, piano studies, and songs. His father was Louis Schlösser, who was a friend of Beethoven's.

Art

"Japanese Flower Arrangement: Ike Bana Applied to Western Needs" (Lane), by Mary Averill, is a prettily printed quarto with numerous outline illustrations. The author follows not the more abstruse and artificial canon of the school of Enshiu-Ryu, but the simpler and more informal methods of Koshin-Ryu. These are still sufficiently conventional for a Western taste. The requirements of a good arrangement are, that it should be clear, tripartite, asymmetrical yet balanced, and that it should suggest the season and give a sense of growth. The arrangement should also be in a definite proportion to the flower holder. All this is different enough from the Western flower lover's ideal of masses of roses in midwinter. The directions are simple and explicit, the diagrams clear and often intrinsically delightful. An especial advantage of the system is that very acceptable arrangements may be made with branches in the absence of flowers. To follow the text and diagrams would be a novel recreation for any flower lover, and as well a disciplinary exercise in taste.

"Early English Water Colour" is the latest addition to McClurg's Little Books on Art ($1 net). The author, C. E. Hughes, has made a pretty complete list of all English aquarellists born before 1820, and has clearly analyzed the style of the more prominent. The book perforce falls into the form of a condensed critical and biographical chronicle, and is somewhat hard reading. As a pocket manual for the tourist collector it has evident advantages. There is a colored frontispiece besides thirty-six other illustrations.

Although John La Farge had long planned to write on the chief pictorial representations of the Gospel stories, "The Gospel Story in Art" (Macmillan; $5 net) was his last work, dictated in invalidism and left in an incomplete condition. The story of Christ is followed chronologically, but the pictures are introduced as the occasion suggests. Usually Giotto is the starting point and Rembrandt the end, but whenever possible Delacroix is introduced. Holman Hunt's Light of the World serves as a cover design, but concerning the religious painting of the Pre-Raphaelite there is significant silence. This cannot be reckoned among La Farge's important books, yet it is delightful in a rambling way and not without flashes of his rare wisdom. One reads it not for systematic information, here it is defective enough, but for a rather casual sort of enlightenment. There are many illustrations, and it should be an acceptable gift to a cultured person. There are a good many slips owing to lack of final revision. A few of the more important, waiving contestable or negligible matters of attribution, we subjoin. It would be difficult to find a Doubting Thomas in the work of Giotto, or a Christ among the Doctors in that of Botticelli. Bianchi Ferrari (p. 244) is converted into Gaudenzio Ferrari; the doors of Beneventum (p. 251) into Bonaventura. The text calls for Tintoretto's Crucifixion at S. Cassiano, but the Crucifixion of S. Rocco is reproduced. It would have been a convenience to the reader and a safeguard against such slips if the location of the picture had been given.

There is scarcely a topic connected with the Nile-land upon which any one is more competent to write than is Gaston Maspero, the director-general of the Service of Antiquities of Egypt. Hence, when a work is published by him such as "Art in Egypt" (Scribner), one feels assured that the subject has been covered with clearness and thoroughness. The book itself, with its five hundred and sixty-five half-tone illustrations, convinces one that every facility has been placed at the disposal of the reader. The only criticism that can be offered is that the illustrations are very often separated from the corresponding text by several pages. Doubtless this is to be excused on account of the large number of pictures. But at the same time the reader may, by taking the pains to examine the illustrations referred to, find almost every statement of the text verified pictorially. Unless this is done one has a sense of being swamped in detail. The historical plan which underlies the treatment is the true one and it serves to bring out the element of progress and development so often denied to exist in the art of Egypt. In fact, it has been feasible to write a true history of Egyptian art, and particularly to illustrate it, only within a few years, because it has only been possible to represent its artistic efforts faithfully within a decade or so. The old engravings of the earlier books were almost invariably no more than caricatures of the originals. Such reproductions as were given in such monumental works as Lepsius's "Denkmäler" were highly conventionalized and quite untrue to the varieties and variations of the actual work. Not till the introduction of the half-tone was it possible to show the fineness of the execution attained by the Egyptian artist, whose low reliefs were characterized by almost infinitesimal gradations of surface level. With this book in hand one scarcely needs to visit the various museums which store the chief treasures of Egyptian art.

As contrasted with the foregoing, another volume on "Egyptian Art" (Appleton), also by Maspero, has a double value. The book is made up of translations of twenty-five magazine articles published at various times, some dated as far back as 1890, some undated, dealing with as many topics connected with the art and archæology of Egypt. The majority have to do with various pieces of statuary and examples of the goldsmith's work in jewelry and plate. Each article may be regarded as an excursus upon some topic in the smaller book, while nearly all of the 107 illustrations have a special value on account o their larger size and greater detail. The second respect in which the book has considerable value is historical. The articles reflect the views entertained during the past quarter of a century or more, while the footnotes call attention to the changes which investigation has made meanwhile. There are two points on which the emphasis is laid: first, the proof of the existence of local schools of art at various centres and the absence of that uniformity with which Egyptian art has been charged; and, secondly, the fact that almost without exception the objects described had to do with the theological views of the makers or owners of them. Comparatively few can be dissociated from the Egyptian belief in the future life. The statues were portraits, so that the disembodied spirit might readily recognize its proper abiding place, its place of residence and retreat; the funereal objects served to secure the possession of the things represented in the land of shades. There are repetitions in the articles, as might be expected from the method and order of their original preparation and publication. These have been retained purposely, since they are historically true and also since they serve to record the reiterations which were needed to convince the skeptical of the truth of the positions advanced. Censure is due for adherence to the French method of transcription of proper names in an English version, which serves to confuse the layman hopelessly and in many cases almost completely to hide the real identity of the person intended.

In "Thomas Jefferson as an Architect and Designer of Landscapes" (Houghton Mifflin) a landscape architect of distinction, Mr. Warren H. Manning, has associated his labors with those of a physician and scholar, Dr. W. A. Lambeth, of the University of Virginia. The handsome volume which embodies the result of these labors is a contribution of great importance to the documented history of our national architecture, for it is based throughout on original sources in the archives of the University of Virginia and elsewhere, checked at every point by a careful study of the buildings themselves. The outcome of these investigations reveals Jefferson as no mere amateur and dilettante, copying the details of antique or Palladian models and relying upon others, with a more practical training, to work out his ideas, but as a real architect who combined scholarly erudition and a refined taste with a surprising amount of practical experience in the science and business of building. The volume is divided into two parts; the first, under Dr. Lambeth's name, treating of Jefferson's work as an architect; the second, by Mr. Manning, of his work as a landscape designer. The University of Virginia naturally furnishes the largest share of the work discussed, but Monticello and Jefferson's hand in the design of Farmington and Bruno (Virginia estates) receive proper attention. The many photographic prints are excellent, including facsimiles of manuscripts and sketches by Jefferson, as well as views of the buildings designed by him. The picture presented of Thomas Jefferson as a man of wonderful resource in widely varied fields is attractive, and is well supported by the evidence set forth by the authors.

"Home Furnishing" (Lane), by George Leland Hunter, is a very valuable book of its kind. It consists of chats, in a popular vein, about furniture, rugs, carpets, lamps, and other lighting fixtures, wall papers, window shades and draperies, potteries and tapestries. The author, who has been connected with a journal of the upholstery trade and who in recent years has qualified as an expert in tapestries, has the gift of talking very directly ad hominem or, and this is more important, ad mulierem. He knows the foolishness of many amateur home makers and the unscrupulousness of some purveyors to their needs and tastes. The story may or may not be apocryphal of the Kansas City woman who entered a New York furniture store to inquire where she should find Mr. Chippendale's shop and who, when informed that the gentleman had been dead some years, asked to be directed to Mr. Sheraton's; it at least illustrates the kind of public which exists for these books of household art. It is a fortunate home maker that gets so good a guide as Mr. Hunter, whose outlook on art is epitomized in this passage:

Art is a dangerous word. The ignorant use it too much; the cultivated use it too little. To describe anything as an art product introduces doubt into the mind of the connoisseur, so familiar are we with the art supplements of newspapers and magazines, and with art shops and the art departments of large stores. And the manufacturer who makes a bad copy of something good almost invariably tries to lift it from fake to fact by means of the prefix, art.

The information about present values of antiques sounds authentic even though the figures will soon be antiquated. The author, or proofreader, on page 213 passed the name of Mrs. Maria Longworth Stover, which, of course, should be Storer.

George Browne Post, architect, died on Friday at his home in Bernardsville, N. J. He was born in New York in 1837, and in 1858 received the degree of civil engineer from the School of Science of New York University. He studied architecture with the late Richard M. Hunt. For gallant service in the Civil War he was promoted to the rank of colonel. Some of the buildings designed by Mr. Post are the New York Cotton Exchange, New York Produce Exchange, New York Stock Exchange, College of the City of New York, Pulitzer building, the building of the Equitable Life Assurance Society that was burned in 1912, the buildings of the Prudential Life and Mutual Life Insurance Companies, in Newark, N. J.; the Wisconsin State Capitol, Cleveland Trust Company building, Cleveland, O., and the Manufactures and Liberal Arts buildings at the Chicago Exposition. Mr. Post was made a Chevalier of the Legion of Honor in 1901 and won great distinction in this country.

Finance

THREE FACTORS IN THE OUTLOOK.

While business on the financial markets this past week was declining to almost negligible proportions, three considerations, each embodied in the actual incidents of the day, appeal to the financial mind as possibly having a significant bearing on the future. One was the Interstate Commerce Commission's hearing of the request of the Eastern railways for permission to raise their freight rates. Another was the advancing of the banking and currency bill to an important stage in its progress towards enactment. The third was the utter stagnation on the Stock Exchange itself, which raised the question, what, if anything, it foreshadowed in the field of general industry, the tendencies of which are so often indicated beforehand by the action of the speculative and investment market.

Of the railway-rate hearing, it may be said at once that the railways presented a strong prima facie case for higher rates. It was based on evidence that expenses have increased largely during the past few years, with no compensatory increase in price of the transportation which the railways sell. Part of this increase in expenses has been merely the railway's side of the phenomenon known to every one as the rising cost of living; part has been an absolute grant, by arbitration boards, of higher wages to railway employees. It has resulted, according to the railway evidence, in a stationary or declining net income, in the face of increasing gross receipts. The railways asked for an average advance of 5 per cent. in freight rates. The evidence yet to be heard may show that they are entitled to this, or to 10 per cent., or conceivably to none at all. But the point of paramount interest, in this hearing, is the policy which the Commission will announce in their findings. As matters stand, the railways are in the very trying position of seeing the price of what they have to buy move steadily up, while, unlike other industrial concerns, they are inhibited from making any advance in what they have to sell. The Interstate Commission, with whom the inhibitory authority is lodged, must now say what its attitude hereafter is to be, and the decision is of great importance to investors.

It has been argued, both that a banking and currency law will immensely help the financial situation, and that it will inject into that situation new and formidable perils. But, obviously, this depends on the character of the bill enacted. With many excellent qualities, the House bill contained many very serious defects. When the Senate committee engaged in thorough review of its provisions, with an eye to amendment, an outcry arose, in certain quarters, that the programme of enacting the law in the extra session which ended last Monday was being inexcusably blockaded. Fortunately, the committee did not listen to these angry criticisms, and the bill has already gone over to the winter session.

There are more reasons than one why this was fortunate. One of the strongest arguments for postponing the vote on the banking bill to the winter session was the obscurity thrown about it, alike by its opponents and by its defenders. The spokesmen for the bill were beginning to talk of the Money Trust coercing the Senate, of the criminal Stock Exchange, of the need for "teaching a lesson" to the bankers. But the hostile critics were going even further, reading irredeemable paper money into the unhappy bill, pointing to a monster, hitherto unknown to political economy, but now described by the interesting name of "fiat credit," and reminding us that if the bill is passed, the Presidential campaign of 1896 will have been fought in vain.

All of these high deliverances, whether from friends or enemies, have no really serious relation to the bill. They properly belong to the class of oratory or literature known as humor of the day. But what that other humorist, Sir John Falstaff, would have called their "damnable iteration," had some inevitable results in clouding the atmosphere. Open Senate debate being now assured, there is prospect of a little fresh air in the controversy. In Congress itself, the danger was not so much that these eccentric views of the pending questions would of themselves influence the vote of either house, as that the directing of attention to such imaginary flaws in the bill might serve the highly undesirable purpose of diverting attention from other points where thorough consideration and intelligent amendment are required.

Whether the lapse in Stock Exchange activity, last week, to the smallest daily total of sales in twenty-five years, does or does not mean a similar contraction in the volume of general business to small dimensions, is doubtless open to discussion. But even if the general scope of this forecast were to be admitted—and the present tendency of the steel trade is at least in that direction—it would require a somewhat daring inference to suppose that volume of trade would have to come down to that of 1888. Analogies do not present themselves in just that way. Our abnormally dull seasons on the Stock Exchange, in recent years, have frequently been accompanied or followed by dull times in trade; but the slackening in business never went to any such lengths as that in stocks and bonds.

It could not possibly do so. The familiar argument, that "business cannot stop moving when the needs of a hundred million American consumers have to be provided for," is not overwhelmingly convincing against trade reaction; but it certainly disposes of a possible decline in business operations to a tenth or a twentieth part of what they lately were. The truth of the matter is that the Stock Exchange is extravagant in its way of "reflecting things." Because daily sales of stocks in 1900 ranged below half a million shares, and rose to two or three millions in April, 1901, it was certainly not to be inferred that merchants and manufacturers in the later month were doing five or six times as much business as in the earlier period. Neither is any one likely to suppose that the country's trade is about to fall to one-tenth of what it was a few months ago, because the daily transactions on the Stock Exchange, which used to be half a million shares, got down one day of last week to fifty thousand.

It is not in this way that deductions are to be drawn from the stock market. A much more useful analogy may be found in the temper and attitude of the market. For three weeks past, all Wall Street has been insisting that Stock Exchange prices must decline. Everything that could break them, from a Mexican crisis to a half-page advertisement by Thomas W. Lawson, was hurled at it; but prices stood immovable. If worse things were to come in the financial world, it was clear that the market ought to break again; and yet it would not break. If the daily trading had been 500,000 shares instead of 50,000, it is probable that Wall Street would have gazed in wonderment at the amazing demonstration of strength.

What this may mean, so far as regards the future course of the Stock Exchange itself, is any man's conjecture. But what it may reasonably be taken to foreshadow, as regards the course of general trade in the immediate future, is that trade itself will presently be attracting comment because it holds up so surprisingly well. It will perhaps be said of general business, as it has been said with somewhat wearisome iteration of stock-market prices, that there is nothing to expect but for things to go from bad to worse. With each successive happening of an unfavorable nature, we shall hear that now, at last, the blow has fallen. But if Business, on a conservative basis of operations, thereupon listens calmly to the prophets of destruction, and goes about its own affairs without regard to them, it will fairly duplicate the stock market of the past week.

Introduction to the History of Religions

Volume IV of the HANDBOOKS ON THE HISTORY OF RELIGIONS

By CRAWFORD HOWELL TOY, Professor Emeritus of Hebrew and other Oriental Languages, Harvard University.

8vo, cloth, xix+639 pages, with reference list and index, $3.00.

This book sets forth the usages and ideas that form the elements of all religions. The development of religion is conceived of as the product of all sides of human thought and activity, economic, political, philosophic, scientific, aesthetic, and ethical. Myths, the lower and the higher objects of worship, and dogmas, crude or refined, are traced to the peculiar conditions of the societies in which they originated and grew. A general progress in the direction of simplicity, refinement, and unity is recognized.

FONTAINE'S FRENCH PROSE COMPOSITION

By C. FONTAINE, Assistant Professor of Romance Languages and Literatures in Columbia University.

35 cents

A new idea is embodied in this book—the teaching of students to translate live English into live French. Instead of artificial and mechanical exercises, the author has introduced new and attractive matter, which will interest the pupil at the same time that it gives him good practice in idiomatic expression and a wide and varied vocabulary. Explanatory footnotes and a grammatical review accompany each lesson. Practice in oral work is provided by a series of questions in French. The vocabulary is complete.

STUDIES IN MILTON AND AN ESSAY ON POETRY

By Alden Sampson, A.M.
(Haverford College and Harvard University.)

Illustrated with a wood-cut by Timothy Cole, N.A., from the bust in clay of Milton at Christ's College, Cambridge, England.

The studies which compose this volume deal mainly with the middle period of Milton's career, and are an examination of his development as a poet and of the various circumstances which shaped and brought to its final effectiveness his lifelong purpose to write a great epic poem. These years, although at the time almost barren of poetic fruit, were vital and formative ones, educating and enriching his nature, enabling him finally to speak with commanding power as poet, statesman, moralist, and impassioned lover of liberty.

(A limited number of proofs on Japanese paper, printed from the wood-cut by Timothy Cole, N.A., in folders of heavy Japanese paper, may be procured from the publishers. Price $5.00 net.)

ALGEBRA OF LOGIC

By LOUIS COUTERAT

Authorized translation by L. G. ROBINSON, with a Preface by PHILIP E. B. JOURDAIN, of Cambridge, England

Cloth. Price $1.50 net.

This is much the simplest and most concise handling of a subject treated much more extensively and ponderously by other representatives of symbolic logic,—for instance, Boole in England, Schroeder in Germany, Peano in Italy, and Peirce in the United States. Couterat's treatise is well fitted to serve as an introduction to the study of mathematical logic. Mr. Jourdain's preface is of an historical character and gives a very thorough account of the development of the subject and the various phases of it especially emphasized by each of its different representatives.

LONDON IN ENGLISH LITERATURE

By PERCY HOLMES BOYNTON, Assistant Professor of English Literature in the University of Chicago.

This volume differs from all other volumes on London in that it gives a consecutive illustrated account of London not from the point of view of the antiquarian but from that of the inquiring student of English literary history.

It deals with ten consecutive periods, characterized in turn by the work and spirit of Chaucer, Shakespeare, Milton, Dryden, Addison, Johnson, Lamb, Dickens, and by the qualities of Victorian and contemporary London. The emphasis is thus distributed over history and given largely to the richer and more recent literary periods. The temper of each epoch is discussed, and then in particular those literary works which are intimately related to certain localities in London.

The work contains four maps and forty-three other illustrations, selected from the best of a great fund of material.

The Life of Francis Thompson
By Everard Meynell

Will Probably be Finally Considered one of the Most Fascinating Literary Biographies Ever Written

That so sensitive, pure and unworldly a personality as Thompson should have lived the life he did live for years among the brutalized, lowest class of London is almost incredible. This is the story of how he was successively a "spoiled priest," a medical student, and a commercial traveller; who went for a soldier and fled to London; who was there by turns an errand-boy, a hawker of newspapers, a boot-black, and a caller of cabs; until his street compositions found him friends and, finally, fame.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1913.

The Week

The comments thus far made by members of Congress and others on Mr. Wilson's recommendation concerning the method of nominating candidates for the Presidency, relate chiefly to Congressional legislation on the matter. But apart from the question of the agency there is another point involved in the President's statement which is well worthy of immediate attention. The party convention, he suggests, should be retained, though constituted upon a different plan; but it should be held "only for the purpose of accepting the verdict of the primaries and formulating the platforms of the parties." Now, this goes far beyond the "preference" idea which most people have in mind when speaking of Presidential primaries; for it precludes the possibility of the convention deciding even between the two candidates, say, receiving the highest number of "preference" votes in the event of nobody having a clear majority. One of the most important questions, therefore, that would have to be considered is that of so dealing with the question of a scattering vote as to guard against possibilities of the most serious mischief.

President Wilson's explanation to the suffragists of the sharp line which he draws between his private opinions and those which he feels at liberty to urge upon Congress would have delighted the heart of Monsieur Distinguo. It inevitably recalls the schoolboy who, when asked to define the art of logic, said that logic was not an art but a dodge. We say this quite irrespective of the particular demand made upon the President. He would doubtless have made a like statement to a labor delegation asking what he did not wish to grant; and, in either case, it does not square with what we believe to be the sound conception of the Presidency as an office in which initiative and leadership are essential. For that matter, it does not square with President Wilson's own practice. No Executive has been more insistent or more successful than he in impressing his personal views upon Congress; and we take it that he would not make a quibbling distinction between doing this in a public message and in earnest interviews with members.

The report of the committee of lawyers on the powers of the Republican National Committee is precisely such as common-sense would lead any one to expect. The National Committee, it is declared, has not the power to change the basis of representation, but it has the power to direct that elections of delegates in any State shall be conducted in conformity with the laws of that State, even if these be at variance with the rules established by the party. It has also the power to call a special national convention, giving due notice thereof. At the Chicago Convention of 1912, the snarl over the conflict between California law and Republican Convention rules furnished a great deal of capital to the Rooseveltians, the like of which can be made impossible hereafter by proper action of the National Committee; but the main difficulty lay in the flagrant Southern-delegate scandal which the Colonel exploited vociferously. The special convention will undoubtedly take radical action in regard to the basis of representation, which will reduce this element of difficulty to a minimum for the future. But it will doubtless do much more than that in the way of a harmony. Recent striking manifestations of progressive weakness in the Progressive party are calculated to add greatly to the interest with which the gathering of the Republican clans will be watched by the country.

In the Secretary of the Treasury's annual report to Congress, particular interest will be attached to the estimates of future public revenue. The ordinary Government receipts, for the fiscal year ending with last June, were $724,111,000; of that amount, $318,891,000 was contributed by customs duties and $344,416,000 by the internal revenue, including excise taxes and the corporation tax. Since the new tariff act and the income tax law went into effect in the first week of October, nearly nine months of the pending fiscal year will draw their revenues under the new and experimental provisions. For the full twelve months ending with next June, Secretary McAdoo estimates a customs revenue of $270,000,000, or $74,400,000 less than was received under the higher duties of the preceding fiscal year. But the internal revenue he estimates as $407,000,000, or $62,500,000 more than in the fiscal year 1913; this being wholly due to the new income tax, which he thinks will yield $33,000,000 from corporations and $54,000,000 from individuals, offset by an $8,000,000 compensatory reduction in the corporation excise tax, which, since the new law was passed, has been superseded by the income tax. In the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, when the new law will be in force throughout the year, he expects an income tax yield of $105,000,000, of which $40,000,000 should come from corporations and $65,000,000 from individuals, while customs revenue will be $69,000,000 less than in the twelvemonth ending last June.

Our own expectation is that the income tax will be more productive than the Secretary thinks; though the factors of uncertainty in such a calculation are numerous. As for the customs revenue, that also has elements which confuse the calculation. Last month, for instance, so far as the figures are at hand, produced a customs revenue only four to five million dollars less than November of either 1912 or 1911, which would hardly indicate as great a reduction, for the whole pending fiscal year, as the Secretary thinks. In his more general comment on the Treasury finances of the year, Mr. McAdoo naturally makes special point of the placing of Government surplus funds with interior banks, against pledge of commercial paper, to avert an autumn stringency. Of the $50,000,000 thus offered by the Treasury, the national banks, up to November 25, had taken only $34,661,000. The Secretary, no doubt correctly, lays as much stress on the psychological effect of the Government's attitude as on the tangible results of the deposits. Observant financiers were aware, when the Treasury made its offer in midsummer, that the danger to the money market arose much more from apprehension of imaginary evils than from actual shortage of funds to move the crops. That the Treasury's earlier offer to provide emergency currency under the Aldrich-Vreeland act, up to $500,000,000, should have elicited no requests at all from the banking community, is an incident from which various conclusions may be drawn.

Some people are smiling at Secretary McAdoo for his discovery that the Treasury can be made a great engine of altruism, but they ought to note, too, that he is making it the home of the sterner virtues. He has given out a letter offering him a bribe for an appointment to office, together with his severe and crushing reply. The man had proposed to pay the Secretary one-third of his first year's salary. To the honor of the Administration, be it recorded that Mr. McAdoo was not tempted for an instant. He scorned the "$100 just as soon as appointed," and then improved the occasion to read a great moral lesson to the writer of the letter, and, incidentally, to the whole country. He roundly declared that the offer to bribe the Secretary of the Treasury "shows your unfitness for public office"; and added: "You do not seem to realize that the era of graft and corruption in American politics is past." Some other things appear also to have passed: among them, one might infer, a sense of proportion and of humor in the Treasury Department. Every Secretary for years must have had idiotic or scoundrelly letters in his daily mail, which his clerks should have been discharged if they had not wit enough to throw away, but it remained for Mr. McAdoo to seize upon one peculiarly imbecile in order to demonstrate the Roman virtue of this Administration.

In spite of all the efforts of those who sought to preserve for the nation the beautiful valley in the Yosemite National Park which goes by the ill-sounding name of Hetch-Hetchy, the Senate on Saturday passed the bill which sacrifices it to the desire of San Franciscans for a cheaper water supply than, as they believe, they could otherwise obtain. But the proceedings in the Senate, and the final vote, showed how much force there was in the arguments and facts adduced against the scheme. Three months ago, the bill was passed in the House almost unanimously; the vote in the Senate on Saturday stood only 43 to 20. When the bill was first brought up in the Senate, an attempt was made to rush it through, and the opposition, at that time represented only by two or three Senators, satisfied itself with a postponement of the vote to a fixed day. Under this condition, the gain of strength for the defenders of the park did not suffice to defeat the bill; but the objections to it, not only on the score of the invasion of the Yosemite, but also because of its effect on the farming lands whose irrigation supply will be cut off, were brought out very strikingly. Senator Works, of California, fought the scheme vigorously; and a letter was read from one of the California Representatives who voted for the bill in the House, but who has discovered that he had been misled as to the facts and is now against it. The bill now goes to the President, with whom rests ultimate responsibility for the decision of its fate. And the paramount consideration in regard to that decision is furnished by the fact that the sacrifice of a national possession of this nature is unjustifiable except upon the clearest possible proof of its necessity.

What is the per capita cost of city government, and how does it rise or fall with an increase in the city's size? Material bearing on these questions was lately collected by a State Commission in Minnesota, and is analyzed by Prof. Edward V. D. Robinson in the Economic Review. The answer to the second query is stated briefly: "In Minnesota the cost of municipal government increases much less rapidly than wealth. In other words, while average cost per capita varies directly, average cost by true valuation varies inversely, with the population." For example, to govern every $10,000 true valuation costs $112.68 in Duluth; in St. Paul but $110.16; and in Minneapolis only $107.49. Lumping these cities in Class 1, towns between 20,000 and 5,000 in Class 2, and those below 5,000 in Class 3, it was found, again, that, while the per capita cost in Class 1 was $16.65, in Class 2 $12.01, and in Class 3 $11.42, the cost per valuation was, in Class 1, $107.20, in Class 2 $127.10, and in Class 3 $133.83. Thus every increase of 10 per cent. in the population of the average city increases the cost of government by about two cents for each citizen; but at the same time it increases the valuation per head about three cents, so that the net result is a gain.

Professor Robinson has less definite reasons for believing that the same facts hold good throughout the country. The net result of the Minnesota figures is simply to suggest that in a typical State there rests with the great city an economic advantage in government which would tend to make the city greater still. Certainly, they give no support to the theory that "increasing cost of city government will set a limit to the continued and ever-increasing congestion of population in urban centres," as compared with habitation in villages and small centres.

The death of Col. Gaillard, the conqueror of Culebra Cut, comes patheticaly close upon the completion of the historic task. In a very real sense he gave his life to his work. Unremitting toil broke his health, and one likes to imagine that it was only a brave spirit which held him on the Isthmus till the work in hand was done. That task was carried on in the manner of the true workman, outside of the glare of publicity and with thought only for the matter in hand. Had Col. Gaillard lived a few months, the nation would have undoubtedly expressed its recognition of his services. His promotion to brigadier-general is contained in a bill which is now pending in Congress and which has been delayed in the stress of business. Public recognition, in addition to such posthumous honors as Congress may decide upon, should now take the form of generous provision for those whom Col. Gaillard has left behind him.

The merciless manner in which Villa and his fellow-commanders in the north of Mexico signalize their victories has justly stirred public horror and indignation. But those who would fashion out of the "bandit" Villa an argument against the justice of the cause he represents, fail to make out their case. The ferocity of Mexican warfare might be compared with the greater ferocities of Balkan warfare among Christian nations and allies. But assuming that Villa is an outlaw, who for twenty years has been a menace to public security, what becomes of the argument that the salvation of Mexico rests only in the strong hand of a Dictator? If the iron rule of Porfirio Diaz could not rid Mexico of brigandage, is it not apparent that permanent peace in Mexico must come in some other way than through the suppression of popular freedom? Brigandage on a large scale cannot flourish anywhere without the secret support of a discontented population. It was Spanish misrule in lower Italy and Sicily that drove the people to support the marauders and secret societies of which they were so frequently the victims. Brigands though they may be, Villa and Zapata are the products of a political system in which the masses are made to feel that the "law" as administered from above is intended not for their benefit but for their subjection.

Announcement that Lord Cromer, Lord Curzon, and Mr. Bryce have under way a movement for an American branch of the Anti-Slavery and Aborigines Society should arouse interest here. The abuses that persist in the darker corners of the world will yield only to this kind of international action. In Africa, in South America, and in Asia it has been found that the attack upon such evils must be through the awakening of indifferent Governments, and exposure of the methods of development companies. The sensitiveness of diplomatic relations and the interlinking of business interests make it important that civilized society join hands in such measures. If the American branch, which is proposed, could be headed by men like ex-Senator Crane and Booker T. Washington, and could throw a public light on the "shocking labor conditions" which investigators allege to exist in Mexico, Bolivia, and Peru, reforms of real world-value might follow.

Representatives of the three chief parties concerned in Home Rule are on record as desiring an amicable conference. Mr. Asquith's words were: "I invite an interchange of views and suggestions, free, frank, and without prejudice." Replying to this invitation, Mr. Bonar Law said that "if the Government have any proposals to make, we will consider them carefully, honestly, and with sole regard, not to the interests of a party, but to the welfare of the nation." And the leader of the Irish, John Redmond, with both the previous statements before him, declared that he did not "shut any door upon a possible settlement by consent." Now comes Asquith's speech at Manchester accepting the basis of agreement suggested by Sir Edward Carson. This makes it highly probable that some way of adjusting the Ulster difficulty without fighting will be found. One reason for believing this is the fact that, as the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Mr. Birrell, insisted the other day, the Irish question has now reached such a pass that, even if the Conservatives were to come into power next year, one of the first things they would have to do would be to pass a bill giving Ireland self-government.

It is not only in the Senate at Washington that the plague of eloquence devastates. Every year in the House of Commons an heroic member moves that "the length of speeches has increased, is increasing, and ought to be diminished." Now the evil is felt in France, where a Deputy has introduced a bill for the repression of eloquence in the Chamber. He would not go so far as one of his colleagues, who proposes to compel orators to stand upon a trap-door in the tribune, which should be sprung the instant they passed the allotted limit of time. The bill in question would restrict the number of speakers who could be heard on any measure, and would absolutely forbid any one of them to go beyond twenty minutes. This bold Deputy, M. Beauquier, maintains that, unless a man has absolutely nothing to say, he can say it in twenty minutes; of course, if he has neither ideas nor facts, it will take him longer. There is both reason and human experience behind this opinion.

In studying the make-up of the new French Cabinet, it is interesting to recall the nature of the discussion attending the election of M. Poincaré to the Presidency of the Republic last January. The advent of M. Poincaré was hailed in a great many quarters, where the wish was father to the thought, as marking the end of Radical ascendency in national affairs, the end of factionalism, and the establishment of a policy of comprehensive patriotism embracing all parties. M. Poincaré was the "strong man" who might even raise the Presidency to a position of real influence, and to that extent reduce the influence of the Chamber as expressed through the Cabinet. Specifically, under the new Administration the purification of national politics was to be brought about by the introduction of proportional representation in Parliament. The Cabinet that now takes office is headed by M. Doumergue, a Radical-Socialist, and is made up of members of that group, Radicals and straight-out Socialists. Only one out of a dozen Ministers is said to be in favor of electoral reform. The Minister of Education is M. Viviani, Socialist and arch-enemy of the religious influence in the schools. M. Poincaré's election has thus obviously brought about no revolution in French Government policy.

Secrets of European diplomacy are brought to light with sufficient frequency to prove that in this country, for all the cunning and audacity the London Times occasionally attributes to us, we are amateurs at the game, mere shirt-sleeved amateurs. The Matin of Paris has just published the text of two secret treaties between Servia and Bulgaria, signed in February, 1912, or more than half a year before the outbreak of the war with Turkey. From these treaties it plainly appears that some of the European Powers were by no means taken by surprise when the conflict broke out. Russia was kept in touch with the plans of the allies, and Austria-Hungary and Germany were also cognizant of the way things were going; England and France were in the dark. When, therefore, the European Concert in the early autumn of 1912 pleaded and fulminated against war, the majority of the Concert showed themselves admirable actors. There was a certain sincerity in the assertion of the Powers that the war would not be allowed to change the status quo in the Balkans. It should seem to have been the hope at St. Petersburg, Vienna, and Berlin, that the combatants would fight themselves into a condition of general exhaustion, with no vital change in the political situation and a consequently freer hand for the Powers to pursue their game of benevolent guidance in the Balkans.

"IDEALIZING" THE MONROE DOCTRINE.

Ambassador Page appears, quite unwittingly, to have fluttered the English dovecotes by his speech at the Savage Club on Saturday night. The London Standard, at all events, took great alarm at his account of the way in which the present Administration at Washington intends to apply the Monroe Doctrine. Mr. Page will probably be surprised to wake up and find that he was threatening British financial interests in Latin America, and that he was serving an important official notice. All that he had in mind, presumably, was to give a matter-of-fact summary of President Wilson's address at Mobile. It was in this that the new policies, so far as they are new, were outlined; yet the English press saw nothing to be frightened at in what Mr. Wilson said. His speech was praised for its fine idealism, though doubt was expressed if he would be able to work it out practically. Certainly, no threat to English investments in Central and South America was seen in it. It was left for the Ambassador, in merely repeating what the President said, to stir up an apprehension which the President himself did not excite.

The nub of the matter lies in the "third proposition" laid down by Mr. Page, that "no sort of financial control can, with the consent of the United States, be obtained over those weaker nations which would, in effect, control their Government." This was not, of course, new with the Ambassador. He was simply paraphrasing the language of the President. Mr. Wilson had said that government in Latin America by concessionaires would be looked upon unfavorably by the United States. And he plainly intimated that adventurers who fought their way to temporary power in those republics, purely for the sake of a chance at the Treasury and concessions, would not be recognized by this country. If this is, as the London Standard asserts, a dangerous "elaboration" of the Monroe Doctrine, it is plain that it had already been made by President Wilson.

Looked at calmly, we think that the truth and force in Mr. Wilson's plan can be discerned, but also the peril. It is true that financial scheming has been at the bottom of many a South American revolution. Possession of the Executive power by means of the army, together with a subservient Congress, has often been made a means of shameless exploitation. In Venezuela, Colombia, Nicaragua, and elsewhere, revolutionists have seized the Government, squeezed it like an orange, and presently gone to join the colony in Paris of kings and presidents en exil. Mr. Wilson is quite right in putting his finger on the wearisome repetition of this process as a great evil. If he can wisely and safely do anything to check it, he will surely be conferring a boon upon the revolution-racked countries to the south of us. And no objection lies to one of the steps he proposes to take. This is to refuse to enter into relations with any chance "President" who upsets an existing Government and fights his way to seeming power in order that he and his fellow-conspirators may feather their nests. In every such case, it would be well for the United States to decline to sanction this means of attaining office, with pecuniary greed stamped all over it. We could, while keeping our hands off, wait to see what happens to the usurper or dictator. We could do routine business with him as the de-facto head of the Government, but withhold full recognition of the validity of his title until his own people had had time deliberately to confirm it. This is the policy which Mr. Wilson at first sought to follow with Gen. Huerta in Mexico, though the increasing disturbances in that country, with their imperilling of American lives and property, soon led him to go further and insist upon Huerta's retiring. The end of this diplomatic intervention in Mexico is not yet, and is probably a long way off; but the course of conduct adopted by President Wilson at the beginning can be defended as proper and useful, and might be followed to advantage in other republics. If an unscrupulous military adventurer knows that he will not, on seizing power, be acknowledged at once as a "great and good friend," his vision of profit by revolution will be blurred.

The case of this "idealized" Monroe Doctrine becomes much more dubious, however, when it goes on to the question of financial control, and of seeing to it that all Spanish-American governments are based upon the consent of the governed. We are at this moment having illustration of the difficulties involved in this. Passing by the Nicaraguan treaty, which in effect proposes an American protectorate, but which is now sleeping in the Senate committee, we have the Dominican affair. First of all, we are administering the finances of San Domingo. This by itself looks as if, when Ambassador Page declared that the United States would assent to no financial control which would amount to control of the Government, he meant no such control except by ourselves. It was confidently asserted that our administration of the Dominican custom-houses would make revolutions in that island impossible. But they have latterly shown their head again. The last one was abandoned upon the promise of our Minister that the United States would insure a fair and free election; and, accordingly, several American "observers" are now en route to be a sort of unofficial inspectors of election in San Domingo next week. They sail despite a vigorous notification by the Dominican authorities that they are not wanted.

In this kind of thing, it is obvious, there lie the seeds of mischief. Deprecating "financial control" of Spanish-American governments, we may be found exercising it. Protesting against force, we may at any moment get into a position where we shall be using force. Standing up firmly for the consent of the governed, we may presently be threatening the governed unless they consent to be governed by us. The whole policy is plainly one requiring the utmost care and discretion in the execution. One precaution, above all, is indicated. All these delicate plans and negotiations must be entrusted to men fitted by character and training to handle them. It is this consideration which heightens the folly of displacing experienced and acceptable Ministers so as to make room for Mr. Bryan's happy-go-lucky friends. That way madness lies.

SWIFTER AND SURER JUSTICE.

In the December World's Work Mr. George W. Alger shows again how an elaborate growth of law-made regulation has hampered our judges. And it is, happily, at this vicious system that those who, in the various States, are working for reform of judicial procedure, are intelligently striking. We have already seen what a gain could be made by the Supreme Court in Washington, in expediting the business before it, when it was empowered to revise its own rules. Much remains to be done in the Federal courts, but the path has been blazed. It is for the States to take the lesson to heart. The hopeful trend of law-reform in America at present is summed up by Mr. Alger as aiming at two things: first, to induce our Legislatures to give to courts the broad powers which English courts possess; and, secondly, to adopt in the United States some of the time-saving methods in judicial procedure which have been practically worked out in England.

The whole thing is a human problem. There is nothing vastly mysterious about it. The simplest inquiry shows that there is a great and wholly needless amount of "waste motion" in our courts. The phrase is Mr. Alger's, and he uses it with no thought of making a pun, though he links it closely with the enormous number of useless and time-consuming "motions" permitted to lawyers under the American practice. One law-reform committee after another has urged the English example, and has made the familiar comparison between the dispatch of business by judges in England and in the United States. This comparison, usually invidious in appearance, is not wholly fair. It may be that, as a rule, English judges are men of more ability and vigor than ours; and they may gain something from their assured position; but the main reason, after all, why they do so much better work is that they have so much better tools. On this point, some of Mr. Alger's statistics are highly illuminating. In 1907, the judges of the County Courts and the City of London Courts disposed of more than 1,300,000 cases. But judgment by default was entered in 448,000 cases, 413,000 were dismissed, 38,000 were tried by the judges without a jury (there were 929 cases tried with a jury), while 404,000 cases were tried by the registers, recorders, or referees. This last is the great relevant point. The English system provides for the handling of a large amount of court business by officers not strictly judicial. Mr. Alger declares that, in England, the greater part of the 63,732 orders signed by judges in non-litigated matters in New York County in 1912, and of the 14,914 orders in litigated matters, would have been disposed of by officials not called judges. In other words, the English judges have far more assistance than ours enjoy; the superfluous rubbish of cases is swept away before the real issue comes before them, and hence they are able to make rapid decisions.

It is along this line of improvement that the recent Practice act in New Jersey proceeds. It provides for commissioners to whom application must be made to determine the nature and issues of a trial before it is taken into court at all. Thus irrelevancies are got rid of in advance, and sham defences stricken out. On one abuse in American practice Mr. Alger comments with much force. It is that of permitting a case—or aspects of it—to be passed upon by a half-dozen different judges. Lawyers will make one motion before one judge and another before another, and so on, thus compelling different judges to familiarize themselves with a case which is really on trial elsewhere. There could hardly be a more ingenious method of wasting time and energy. But in England the rules of the court require that one judge shall be assigned to conduct a given case from the beginning to the end, and all motions concerning it must be made before him. Is there any good reason why Americans should not display equal sense?

Our plight is by no means hopeless. The wheels of our chariot of justice drive no more heavily than was the case in England when Sydney Smith wrote of the Court of Chancery that it showed "a complication, formality, entanglement, and delay which the life, the wealth, and the patience of men cannot endure." Smilar words are often used of our present judicial procedure, and they are deserved; but the way out is clearly indicated. Fortunately, a great amount of well-directed energy is now expended by committees of the bar on the problem of judicial reform. It is only necessary to make steady application of common-sense and human experience.

REICHSTAG, ARMY, AND EMPIRE.

The debate in the Reichstag on Wednesday of last week, on the recent scandalous misconduct of an army officer in Zabern, Alsace, is said to have been the most exciting and the bitterest in nearly twenty years. But it was not without precedent—unless it be in the intensity of feeling. War Minister after War Minister has stood up in the Reichstag to defy its members, denounce the radical wing, and to utter the mediæval doctrine that in the Empire the army is supreme, and that its sacred honor must be upheld at any cost. In each case the Minister has either come direct from the Kaiser or spoken for him impliedly, and always the Reichstag has been helpless because of the lack of a Ministry responsible to its will. It has passed now a vote of censure on the Government—in itself an extraordinary occurrence—but nothing may happen. The garrison has indeed been removed from Zabern, somewhat to the dismay of the tradesfolk of that town; but no Ministers will fall, unless the Kaiser yields to public pressure, because the Kaiser alone makes or unmakes them, and it is his belief, frequently expressed, that before the "gay coat" of the military the people must bow, as Gessler tried to force Tell to make obeisance to his hat. The Kaiser learns but slowly.

It is precisely this independence of the Reichstag that renders the army so indifferent to popular anger and criticism. The newspapers may rage, but the army pays no attention to the "radical, traitorous press." Individual members of the Reichstag may criticise, but it is the rule that no one high up in the army loses his place or suffers for any act of official tyranny or misconduct towards the public. Lieut. Baron von Forstner, the offending Zabern officer, who gibed at the French Foreign Legion and the populace while drilling his company, is but too common a type. Oddly enough, the Reichstag is itself partly responsible for its own impotence, for, when the Ministry asks for more men, money, and arms, it votes them without hesitation. Even the Socialists made no determined fight last summer against the great levy for additional troops. The Reichstag invariably cowers before the old bogeys of a French war of revenge, of hostilities with Russia or England, and authorizes what is at least a "two-Power army," while the nation as a whole unquestionably approves. Thus the military trumphs and increases its strangle-hold on the country.

As a whole, the nation approves, we repeat. But deep down, we believe, there are feelings ominous for those responsible for the present autocratic military régime. There is a national pride in the superb appearance, excellent physique, and drill of the army, but at the same time there is resentment not only at the overbearing attitude of the corps of officers, but at the withdrawal of so many men from industrial life, the huge waste of funds, and the fact that wnen in service the men under arms are not only there to frighten off foreign nations, but to overawe their countrymen. They are truly the props of the monarchy, though it is a gross exaggeration, of course, to say, as Gen. von Falkenhayn did last week, that without them not a stone of the Reichstag building would remain in place. For the present it is an easy task for the militarists to rivet their chains upon the people. The army is pictured as a democratic institution; every schoolboy is taught that but for it the German nation would never have come to pass, and could not now exist; and the periodical war scares are used to increase the terrible financial burdens. These, despite the nation's wonderful prosperity, steadily increase the trials of the poor, hundreds of thousands of whom can no longer afford meat save as a rare luxury. And always the army stands, by its very nature, in direct opposition to liberal progress of every kind. It would be certain to support the Kaiser if he should order the closing of the Reichstag, precisely as it ended the uprising of the people in 1849.

And it is especially deplorable that the particular excesses which have aroused the nation should have taken place in Alsace-Lorraine. Prince von Bülow has recently published his regret that the German Government has made no better headway in the recaptured provinces. They form the clearest kind of demonstration of the folly of any conquest to-day. The Germans have never won the hearts of the Alsatians any more than we have those of the Filipinos. They hold these lands as we do the Philippines, by brute strength. It is true that Alsace and Lorraine have shared the prosperity of the Empire, but all the revenue they have paid into the treasury is but a trifle as compared to what they have cost the nation by reason of their being a chief cause of its huge militaristic expenditures.

THE TOWN AND COUNTRY MUSE.

Whether we like it or not, the lark and the nightingale are fast disappearing from poetry. As in Dr. Johnson's day, the city presents a superior appeal to that of the country, and various poets are responding to its call. They have turned in part to street scenes. They note the unexpected meeting of eyes in a crowd—that experience which to Lowell was always so stimulating—the veiled sorrow of a passerby, and all the other individual semblances that lurk behind the masses' collective attitude. Most of such written observations are still in the experimental stage; at best are vignettes requiring a larger vision to lift them to real worth. Even Mr. Masefield's researches of the gutter, though bearing the authentic colors and intonations, are usually but raw material. One has only to compare one of his vagabonds with Wordsworth's poor Michael, simple character as the latter is, to feel the fundamental lack in much of such work.

Yet there are features of the city which can stir the imagination to transforming power. Admitting that the chirp of the sparrow cannot compensate for the lark's wild delight or for Philomel's sorrow, yet the city, too, has its whirr of wings and gush of song. Incidentally, it may be asked, has no city-dweller, stopping in the country, ever mistaken the note of a brook for a distant train? One American poet, Mr. Chester Firkins, sees sufficient poetic excitement in a subway express:

> I, who have lost the stars, the sod,
> For ehilling pave and eheerless light,
> Have made my meeting-place with God
> A new and nether Night—
> Have found a fane where thunder fills > Loud caverns, tremulous;—and these > Atone me for my reverend hills
> And moonlit silenees.
> A figment in the erowded dark,
> Where men sit muted by the roar,
> I ride upon the whirring Spark
> Beneath the city's floor.
> In this dim firmament, the stars
> Whirl by in blazing files and tiers;
> Kin meteors graze our flying bars
> Amid the spinning spheres.

It was perhaps too fanciful to discover in the Brooklyn Bridge, as one poet did, a great harp which softened by the breath of the sea the city's harsh music. Yet it illustrates an increasing endeavor to get behind the man-made metropolis and to reach its inner meaning. We commend to such writers that great witches' caldron which lies in New York over St. Paul's and near by the Singer building, where twilight merges into a thousand starry spaces and circling vapors cast a spell. Man builds, as man built Babel, and scarcely has he finished when his edifice is invested with a spirit on which he never reckoned and which only the seer can understand.

Foreigners have wondered why our writers have done so little with the blast furnaces of Pittsburgh. Well, one poet, at least, has given us a notable picture of a smelter on a hillside, like a Cyclops, looking down on the city. Not only the city proper, but the spectacular handiwork of the city wherever found, is quickening more and more our young poets' fancy. For Mr. Percy Mackaye the automobile can also be a Pegasus. The following lines are a portion of his sonnet on that topic:

> Fluid the world flows under us: the hills
> Billow on billow of umbrageous green
> Heaved us, aghast, to fresh horizons, seen
> One rapturous instant, blind with flash of rills
> And silver-rising storms and dewy stills
> Of dripping boulders, till the dim ravine
> Drowned us again in leafage, whose serene
> Coverts grew loud with our tumultuous wills.

Mr. Stephen Phillips, though without much success, has laid hold of the aeroplane. These new tendencies are most interesting, yet whether they will change the complexion of poetic imagery it is too early to say. Mr. Firkins, in the passage quoted, has described his feelings in the subway in the terms of the older poetry, using, that is, details which have a long poetic tradition. The strict modernist would, of course, object to this method by pointing out that it is almost as archaic to liken the subway to "fanes" and "firmaments" as to sing of Greek temples and the stars directly. It is indeed a question whether the poets of the present can, even if they would, dispense with "lyric Apollo" and all his kin. Mr. Mackaye, in the one instance cited, has, it is true, confined himself to a language of motion and sound which seldom harks back. But as a general rule poetry will hardly achieve desired sweep and perspective without drawing on the poetic associations of other days, and especially of the free out-of-doors. Wherever mere man, plodding for his daily bread—be it in a sweltering summer of the East Side or in the humdrum of a Wall Street office—looks up and feels the stir of other things, Pan has piped for him. The muse of the country and that of the city are really first cousins, only one of them just now bears the ignominy of being styled a "country cousin."

SCIENTIFIC MANAGEMENT OF CHRISTMAS.

It has long been felt that something should be done to curb the excesses of the Christmas spirit. Beginning about a month before the 25th of December, a large part of the world falls victim to the most extravagantly benevolent impulses. The shops become filled with jostling crowds of careworn, irritable persons who glare at one another and exhaust their ingenuity in efforts, usually vain, to get the clerks to pay some attention to them. The evenings of the home are given over to discussions, now and then verging upon the acrimonious, as to what presents shall be purchased and where they shall be sent. This is often varied by conjectures as to what is likely to be received, and from whom. It is an inspiring spectacle. Everybody is thinking about giving. Finally, the long-awaited day arrives. The packages are opened. The doubt whether Cousin Kate would send anything or not is cleared up. With the strain of all these decisions removed, and their consequences known, there ensues a brief period in which people give way even more completely to the impulses of good-will. They exchange greetings with some show of warmth, inquire after the prosperity of those who do them any small service, and forget, for the moment, that business is business, and that life is short. It is sometimes as much as ten days after Christmas before normal conditions are restored.

Will our descendants believe that it was not until the second decade of the twentieth century that the world was aroused to the viciousness of this annual debauch of kindness? Will they believe that it was actually necessary to form societies in order to keep our better selves from getting the better of us? Such must be our humiliating confession. The first step towards scientific management of Christmas was the preparation of lists of gifts, so that no debt, hanging over from the previous year, should go unpaid. But this was not immediately followed by another. People were still so completely under the control of their unregulated impulses that they gave without thinking whether their gifts were useful or only representative of sentiment. Fathers still brought drums and horns to sons who were in dire need of books on "How to Study." Mothers still presented their daughters with dolls instead of copies of the election laws. And the amount of cards sent round, from hand-painted ones to those bought by the gross, staggers the imagination. From this intemperance of generosity we are just emerging. Its shadow is yet over us, so that we are not always absolutely sure of the distinction between the useful and the sentimental. But we are learning.

The worst effect of the unregulated Christmas spirit is that it lulls our natural suspicion of our fellows. To such an extreme of guilelessness has this carried us that the Police Commissioner of a great city has thought it necessary to issue an official warning. Don't forget, he says in substance, that this is in reality the same old lost world that it has been from the first. Christmases come and Christmases go, but human nature goes on forever. In particular, don't pay for C. O. D. packages until you have taken a look at them, and satisfied yourself that they contain something that you have ordered. Don't tempt your fellow-man by displaying what money you happen to have about you. Don't leave the room in which a messenger has delivered a parcel until the messenger has gone. Don't permit your cashier to hand out change before he has the piece of money he supposed himself to be changing. Don't leave your automobile unguarded in the street. Now, a careful person would be more or less apt to observe all of these injunctions at any season. The point of the Commissioner's warning is that at Christmas the individual is inclined to be so soft-hearted as to become the prey of the designing. How foolish to imagine that everybody is benevolently inclined merely because you are!

The good citizens of that town may endeavor to obey the Commissioner. But it will be a bit hard at first to look upon the person next them with one gracious and one suspicious eye. This, of course, is only because scientific management of Christmas is so new. As soon as we have had time to get accustomed to it, we shall be able to stare any messenger-boy with a C. O. D. package out of countenance while making him feel perfectly at home by the ardor of our greeting. We shall have no trouble in crying "Merry Christmas!" to the obliging stranger who directs us to the street we are hunting, in a tone that lets him know that we are not to be caught off our guard. It will become second nature for us to give the newsboy and the bootblack the little remembrance we have been in the habit of giving them, in a manner that tells them as plainly as words that we are not so "easy" as they may think we look. It is a high scientific ideal, but we shall manage to attain unto it. Whether it will be worth the trouble it will cost, is a question; it might even be easier to spread a little of the better part of the Christmas spirit over the rest of the year.

NEWS FOR BIBLIOPHILES.

Almost before Indiana had acquired its statehood an historical work of some distinction was written and published on Hoosier soil. "The Sketchbook" and the "Leatherstocking Tales" had not yet appeared; William Cullen Bryant had published "Thanatopsis" only two years before, when the village of Salem, lying among the hills thirty miles north of Louisville, made its début as a publishing centre. It was before the days of railway or telegraph, and steamboats had only begun to appear on the Ohio. Paper, type, and presses had to be hauled by wagon from Louisville. The State capital was at Corydon, and the site of its successor, Indianapolis, was still unbroken forest. Salem itself was a backwoods village, yet, as county seat, already boasted a weekly paper; and it was in this little one-room office that the work in question, a biography of Napoleon, was published.

In 1818, when this book appeared, its hero still had half his dreary imprisonment at St. Helena to undergo. The title page reads: "The Life / of / Bonaparte, / late Emperor of the French, / &c., &c., &c., / from his birth until his departure / to the / Island of St. Helena, / by a citizen of the United States. / Salem, Indiana, / Printed by Patrick & Booth. / 1818." It will be observed that the author's name is not mentioned, and this omission has given rise to a deal of speculation. Some have thought that Mr. Patrick, the senior member of the publishing firm, himself wrote as well as printed the book. Another and more interesting theory attributes the composition to a German or Polish officer who had served on the staff of Marshal Ney and with him had undergone the horrors of the Russian campaign. He had appeared in Philadelphia in 1815, shortly after the final catastrophe at Waterloo, in a state of destitution, and had gradually drifted westward till he settled at length in southern Indiana. He gave his name as Lehmanowski (or Lemanowski), though some of those who came to know him best declared later that it had originally been Lehmann. Finding a widespread interest in Napoleon throughout the West, he prepared and delivered in many places a series of lectures on the career of the great captain, of whom he was a warm admirer. In private conversation he told many thrilling experiences of his own, declaring that he had taken part in 125 battles in the army of Napoleon. Among other things he gave a circumstantial account of the supposed execution of his old chief, Marshal Ney, and of that hero's escape and his life in this country.

While it is not possible to prove this officer the author of our book, there are several bits of evidence which have weight. First, the book itself is written with entire confidence of statement, and displays an acquaintance with the acts and words of Napoleon which is natural enough in one who had personally known him. Many documents, too — decrees, proclamations, speeches, etc.—are given bodily, some of which do not appear in much larger and fuller works. There is, furthermore, the direct testimony of an early resident of Salem, who knew Lehmanowski intimately, to the effect that he was the author; and this is reinforced by the assertions of Lehmanowski's own sons. Yet with all this, the proof falls short of certainty.

As to the volume itself, it measures 4x7 inches over all, is printed on a tough, substantial paper, and bound in full calf. The type is approximately 9-point, with a rather small face. There are occasional errors in the typography, mostly of single letters, but on the whole it is a fairly "clean" and creditable piece of work. About one-third of the 257 pages of the biography are devoted to the first thirty-five years of Napoleon's life, and the rest to the history of his reign as Emperor. Only one short chapter—hardly more than five pages—is expended upon his early years, the second chapter opening with his marriage to Josephine. Three chapters contain the story of the Italian campaigns which first revealed his genius to the world; then two are given to his Egyptian enterprise, and another two to his gradual absorption of supreme power as consul.

The author's attitude towards his subject is revealed in this paragraph:

> To a philosophic mind no spectacle could be more interesting than that which France presented at this period of her history. It was the spectacle of a great nation which, after breasting the storms of a more terrible revolution than any that history records, was again forced back by a mighty combination of foreign powers to the point from which she started—to the sway of a family whom she had driven with ignominy from the throne and whose expulsion had been sealed by the blood of millions of her people. . . . The house of Bourbon was driven from the throne—for more than twenty years France remained steadfast in her aversion to that family; she waded through oceans of blood and endured every privation—the bravest of her warriors have fallen and the greatest and wisest of her patriots and philosophers have been sacrificed to confirm the expulsion of a dynasty which they declared incapable of reigning in consequence of its multiplied crimes. But vain have been her efforts! The iron hand of force has succeeded in dethroning the man who, with all his faults, has contributed more in the fourteen years of his power to the prosperity and glory of France than had been achieved for centuries before; and in the vacant throne they have put a member of the proscribed family of Bourbon, a man of imbecile character, an enemy to all those glorious recollections which can alone console France under her present misfortunes; a king, in short, who has avowed himself indebted for his crown to the ancient and unrelenting foe of the nation he was about to govern. Such was the humiliating picture which France presented at the period of Napoleon's abdication.

The explanation of the rout at Waterloo is one which a soldier of the grand army might have been expected to endorse. After mentioning the arrival on the field of the Prussians under Bülow and Blücher the author goes on:

> At this period a panic, strange and incomprehensible in men who had distinguished themselves by such unparalleled heroism before, was observed to have seized some troops of the middle guard, which immediately communicated itself to those around. The Prussians availed themselves of the moment and sprang forward to the charge, followed by the English army, and the effect was decisive. . . . Such was the issue of the ever-memorable battle of Mount St. John or Waterloo; a battle which cast a darker gloom over the destiny of France than any which has loured in her horizon since the day of Agincourt. Yet, fatal as the result was, the conflict shed a ray of glory on the arms of France of which defeat cannot rob them. For three days the French fought the armies of Prussia and England, commanded by their ablest generals, and victory attended them to the last hour, when it was snatched from their grasp by a fortuitous event which no skill could have anticipated.

The history closes with the exile's embarkation on the Northumberland, but in a brief appendix is given a two-page description of St. Helena, followed by lists of the members of Napoleon's family, the kings created by him, and the nobility of his creation. The little book is readable and in the main remarkably correct, especially when its early date is considered. Unfortunately not more than five copies are known to be in existence, and even the State Library of Indiana, which makes a specialty of State history and literature, has been obliged to be content with a typewritten copy.

Correspondence

OPIUM IN THE DUTCH EAST INDIES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your issue of November 13 I find a communication from Mr. Bertrand Shadwell, dated September 18, which concludes with the remark that, if the Dutch East Indian Government "could be induced, in the interest of humanity, to renounce its profits [on the sale of opium] and to close its opium manufactory, the practice of the opium vice in Java would cease at once."

Mr. Shadwell's implied wish is shared by many, but a formidable obstacle lies in the path of its realization, to wit, precisely those profits he rightly calls very large since the revenue derived from the opium monopoly in the Dutch East Indies exceeds the outlay by more than 200 per cent. As regards her renouncing this lucrative if unholy traffic, Holland has always shown herself perfectly willing to engage in any amount of talk while reserving her liberty to shun parallel action in the interest of humanity as a totally different matter. Holland has consequently never lagged behind in joining opium conferences and congresses, bravely discussing conditions, and voting for or against amendments; gladly extending her hospitality to the delegates of the participating countries, lately assembled at The Hague. Holland furthermore, according to the periodically recurring statements of her successive Ministers for the Colonies, takes nothing so much to heart as the moral and material welfare of the millions of inhabitants of her vast Asiatic possessions. But it is a curious fact that the louder she proclaims her determination to perform her colonial duties, the less chance these laudable intentions stand, by destiny's strange decree, of being translated into deeds—every one in her oversea dominions knows that.

The opium vice has been imported into Java, not to forget the exterior possessions, and sedulously fostered expressly for the sake of gain. When the scandals of the opium farm began to cry to heaven, reform was promised in the shape of the so-called Opium Regie. Government was going to restrain, gradually to prohibit, the use of opium by doing away with the Chinese middlemen, by preparing opium for native consumption in a Government opium manufactory, and retailing it in Government opium shops, to be smoked in Government opium dens. And what now is the result of this fine measure? In the year 1903 I was clapped in jail, thanks to the power conferred upon Dutch colonial authorities by a mediæval Press act, for predicting in the Batavia newspaper I then edited what since has happened and could not fail to happen, given Dutch colonial shortsighted rapacity. I foresaw, as any one might have foreseen, that the "reform" ushered in with a tremendous show of paternal care for the native population at the expense of the Dutch exchequer, would produce a diametrically opposite effect. In vindication of my protest, the opium habit has spread far beyond its former confines, and goes on spreading under the Government Regie worse than ever under the Chinese opium farm, with continually greater immediate profit to the aforementioned exchequer and corresponding greater loss, materially and morally, to the peoples under Dutch colonial rule. The net gain, less than $5,600,000 in 1902, is estimated at $8,000,000 for the current year and $8,400,000 for 1914, while the actual net receipts will doubtless enormously exceed the latter sum, since the Government estimates referring to this shady source of revenue are, for obvious reasons, kept very low.

Yet official and non-official spokesmen of the Dutch and Dutch East Indian Governments declare solemnly in official, semi-official, and non-official statements on each and every occasion that they are stamping out the opium vice in the Dutch East Indies—not the only fiction assiduously maintained: mundus vult decipi, ergo decipiatur. No wonder that the colonial excellencies, comfortably retired after their diligent application of this golden rule, meeting at their clubs or in the street, can hardly refrain from smiling, like the Roman augurs, when looking at one another.

DIALECT IN LITERATURE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: When in doubt as to the merits of a literary dispute, consult Goethe. What he says concerning dialects seems to me to have a direct bearing on the subject recently discussed in the columns of the Nation. I translate from the second part (sixth Book) of "Wahrheit und Dichtung."

I had been born and bred to use the Upper-German dialect, and although my father always cultivated a certain purity of language, and early called the attention of his children to what may be regarded as the defects of that idiom, preparing us thus for better speech, I still retained certain deep-seated and naïve peculiarities, of which I had grown fond. I liked to air them, though by their use I invariably incurred a severe reprimand from my new fellow-townsmen. [He was living in Leipzig at the time.] . . . The Upper-Germans, and particularly those who live near the Rhine and Main (great rivers, like the sea-coast, diffuse general animation) are fond of expressing themselves in similes and allusions, and clothe sound common-sense in apt proverbs. Such language is sometimes blunt, though never out of place, considering its intent. Nevertheless, it cannot be denied that here and there a delicate ear may object to certain idioms.

Every province loves its own dialect, for, properly speaking, the soul draws from it its very life-breath. But every one knows with what obstinacy the dialect of Meissen has lorded it over the rest, so that all other speech was almost excluded in that region. . . . I was made to feel that I ought to eschew the use of proverbs, which, instead of beating about the bush, always hit the nail on the head. . . . I was to forget all that, in the ardor of my youth, I had made my own. My inmost heart was, as it were, struck dumb, and I scarcely knew how to express the commonest things. Withal, I was told that one should speak as one writes, and write as one speaks; while to me speaking and writing were absolutely two different things, each of which had its own rights.

Elsewhere, in reviewing a play, written in the Alsatian dialect, Goethe deprecates the "consolidation of the various German dialects as a means of promoting national unity." This, he said, would only lead to "the destruction of the real character of the nation." He thought dialects "a perfectly legitimate outgrowth of youthful impressions and of the concurrence of the organs of hearing, speech, and thought."

Now, what Goethe says of the German language is equally true of another. But, in speaking of dialect, we must distinguish between long-established speech and passing slang, between what is homely and permanent and what is vulgar and ephemeral. True poets have at all times known how to put existing dialects to effective use. In the most cultivated literary circles of northern Germany the popularity of Fritz Reuter's plattdeutsche poems and stories is as great as is that of Hebel's "Alemannische Gedichte" in southern Germany. The charm of Rosegger's and Anzengruber's Styrian peasant speech is as real as that of Burns's Scotch idiom, which has captured the whole world. Some lines in Tennyson's "Northern Farmer" are as striking as the polished verse of "In Memoriam." Gerhart Hauptmann's Silesian dialect is often telling; his Berlin dialect never is. Our "coon songs" are, indeed, generally vile, but in Foster's negro melodies the words seem as truly poetic as anything ever set to music. Uncle Remus's negro prose continues to live and delight. Mistral has enriched Provençal speech until it has become, as has been said, the classic vulgate of the Félibres. Some dialects, such as the Pennsylvania Dutch, seem incapable of furnishing poetic inspiration; others, like that of the mountaineers of Tennessee, when handled by as able a writer as Miss Murfree, have made their entrance into literature. Whether "hoosier" poetry deserves to be seriously discussed in a journal like the Nation depends entirely on the question whether we esteem the man who writes it a real poet or not.

THACKERAY'S "LITTLE BILLEE."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your issues of November 6 and 20 the News for Bibliophiles contains discussions of the source of Thackeray's "Little Billee." The London Academy of July 12, 1884, has a letter on the subject by "E. G." (Edmund Gosse?), and there are other letters in the numbers for July 19 and August 16. The first letter contains the text of "Le Petit Navire," quoted from Mélusine, I, 463. In the second number, which contains three letters, there is a rendering into Greek, and Alfred Nutt remarks: "The 'Petit Navire' is a catch as familiar in France as the 'Three Blind Mice' in England. Every boy and girl throughout the country knows it by heart. There can be no doubt that Thackeray picked it up during his stay in France, and simply adapted it."

CELT AND KELT.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: When freshmen talk about "Kelts" something should be done. This barbarism —Kelt—came into fashion presumably some time after the late Professor Freeman had indulged his fancies of spelling—fancies hardly outdone by Robert Browning. The Hellenism of both men was picturesque, and it was pleasant to observe the freedom of these masters.

Upon what authority—save that of a growing desire to be different from others—have Kelt and Keltic thus come into use? The answer would seem simple enough: a dictionary will clear up the matter. Curiously, I have found no single instance where Kelt and Keltic have been cited as warrant for this use. In one dictionary only is precedence given to Kelt over Celt, and that is in Liddell and Scott's Lexicon, though why it should be given first when later in the text "κελτικός = Celtic, Gallic." is not apparent. The last edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica has no entry under Kelt, Keltic. The Standard and New International Dictionaries give Kelt as a variant for Celt, with no authorities; and the New International relegates Kelt to the fine print at the bottom of the page. Although the 1908 edition of Brockhaus's Konversationslexicon enters the name under Kelt for treatment—a cross-reference from the bare word Celt—the Wörterbuch of Flügel-Schmidt-Tanger enters only Celte, celtisch. Harper's Latin Dictionary naturally gives Celtic. From the French sense of the fitness of things one could expect only Celt, celtique, recognized in the dictionaries of that self-respecting language. And the Spaniards observe Romance tradition in Celta, celtico, etc.

The real humor of Kelt is most keenly perceived in reading the long list of perfectly natural English words, Celt, celtic, etc., given in the Oxford Dictionary. Celt has been a normal form since 1607. Its origin is obvious; and nouns, adjectives, and adverbs have been made from it for 300 years. Celtic scholars in Great Britain have found Celt and Celtic quite good enough for their modest, not to say reverent, use. He would be rash who questioned Whitely-Stokes's taste or good sense in writing Celtic. Nor have Celtic scholars on the Continent felt bound to adopt an initial K for the word because the Greeks used it. The Zeitschrift fur Celtische Philologie suggests that Kelt is not universal in German university circles. When Holder gave the name to his monumental "Alt-Celtischer Sprachschatz" he did not affect a pedantic superiority to the usage of the vernacular.

Who shall defend this barbarism in English? Kelt and Keltic are the only forms admitted in volume one of the Cambridge "Mediæval History." Who will accept the challenge thus thrown at the historical evidence for Celt offered by Oxford? In plain terms, is not Kelt a mere affectation?

SWINBURNE BIBLIOGRAPHY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: May I solicit the aid of your readers in my attempt to render more nearly complete my bibliography of books, articles, and poems by Swinburne? This bibliography, tentatively published as an appendix to the new collection of Swinburniana entitled "A Pilgrimage of Pleasure," is admittedly incomplete. It does not, however, pretend to mention articles or poems which have been gathered into volumes by Mr. Swinburne or his executor. It does aim to list all first editions and such essays, stories, and poems as Mr. Swinburne has not seen fit to reissue in book form. I shall be exceedingly grateful for such assistance as your readers may give me in my effort to publish a complete checklist of Swinburniana.

INSOMNIA.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The remedy for insomnia contributed to your issue of December 4 may be called a mental method. There is a strictly physical method that often works successfully, as I and others have found. Get a woven rubber bandage from a surgical supply store and wind it around the chest, so that an appreciable exertion must be put forth to expand the lungs. The additional effort required to breathe will in a very short time relieve the congestion that is causing the trouble. The bandage must not be so tight as to cause real difficulty in breathing, or it will defeat the purpose desired. OSCAR WOODWARD ZEIGLER.

Literature

HOLIDAY BOOKS.—II.

Dickens is naturally among the novelists brought out for the holiday season. Of the quarto "Old Curiosity Shop" (Doran; $5 net) the distinguishing feature is the illustrations in color by Frank Reynolds, R.I. It is not every novel that admits of being elaborately illustrated to the satisfaction of those who treasure their own mental images of its characters; and when the thing does admit of being done, there are still a hundred ways of going astray in the execution. But Dickens's story of Little Nell, and her grandfather, and Sampson Brass, and Sally Brass, and Quilp, and Dick Swiveller is precisely of the kind which good pictures cannot hurt; and Mr. Reynolds has made capital ones—at once good to look at and chiming in with our notion of the characters.

Mrs. Gaskell, of "Cranford," was not a towering genius, but her work was sterling, and it has worn well. Dodd, Mead & Co. have issued her "Wives and Daughters" ($1.50 net) in a pleasing volume of 641 pages, with many illustrations. The print is small, but remarkably clear. There is an interesting analytical and critical preface by Thomas Seccombe, sketching and estimating Mrs. Gaskell's literary career as a whole, but devoted chiefly to this work. "The characters," says Mr. Seccombe in closing, "are as difficult as ever novelist attempted, the success as great as ever novelist achieved."

Very slender are the princesses and much bewigged are their suitors in Kay Nielsen's illustrations of the fairy tales which, retold by Sir Arthur Quiller-Couch, form the text of the happily named volume, "In Powder and Crinoline" (Doran). Sir Arthur complains of a plentiful lack of fairy stories of the age of crinoline, but has made shift to find three, including one of his own.

A charming book from Doran's is Barrie's "Quality Street" ($5 net). Here we have, owing to the brevity of the work, a quarto sumptuous in its heavy paper and large type, with illustrations by Hugh Thomson—some in color and some in black and white—of a rare delicacy and piquancy. Those to whom the play, as given by Maude Adams, is a delightful memory, will enjoy having that memory refreshed by the text and pictures of this attractive volume.

Two essays, believed to be hitherto unpublished, one by Charles Dudley Warner and the other by Walt Whitman, are put forth by the Carteret Book Club of Newark in editions limited to one hundred copies. Warner's essay is a short appreciation of Charles Dickens, of whom it remarks that half an hour "is worth a lifetime of his self-conscious analyzers." Whitman begins his essay, which is on "Criticism," by suggesting that he may be going to write upon something that does not exist. But he thinks that it might exist, and, if of the right kind, "might arrest, hold up to scorn, and in due time thoroughly exterminate, a false and vicious school of current writers, and might prepare for, beget, and bring forward to maturity, crops of noble writers and even poets, instead. But this," he also thinks, "is supposing a stature of Critics and Criticism . . . far higher than British or European literature has even yet afforded."

Robert Haven Schauffler has written a "Romantic America" (Century; $5 net). There is a robust text to carry the handsome illustrations, which is not always the case with your volume de luxe. It is no disparagement to the galaxy of artists who have collaborated with the writer—Maxfield Parrish, Joseph Pennell, André Castaigne, Anne Bosworth Greene, Harry Fenn, and Henry Guy Fangel among others—to say that without their work the book would still be a vivid portrayal of the charm of American landscape and our older architecture. Much of the material is necessarily preordained—the Grand Cañon, the Yosemite, the Yellowstone, New Orleans, and the colonial homes of old Virginia; but the familiar stuff is freshly handled. The volume is a handsomely printed quarto.

One of the most elaborately wrought books of the present season is "Parsifal, or The Legend of the Holy Grail, Retold from Ancient Sources, with Acknowledgment to the 'Parsifal' of Richard Wagner," by T. W. Rolleston, presented by Willy Pogány (Crowell; $6 net). The 192 pages have been reproduced by lithography in two colors, each page, including the lettering, being the work of the artist. There are sixteen plates in full color, besides numerous marginal designs. Though not distinguished, the heroic couplets in which the legend is told move for the most part smoothly.

From the same publishers comes a new edition of the "Rubáiyát" ($1.50 net), in less expensive style than that issued by them two years ago. Though the size of the page has been slightly decreased and the weight of the paper reduced, the new edition has been printed from the same plates as the more elaborate volume, and has the same number of illustrations (twenty-four) in full color. The work of the artist, Willy Pogány, is too well known to require description.

Henry van Dyke's "The Toiling of Felix," a poem based upon the "sayings of Jesus" discovered in a papyrus fragment near the Nile in 1897, receives holiday recognition in an edition containing illustrations in color by Herbert Moore and border decorations by Edward B. Edwards (Scribner; $1.50 net). Another book of verse is Robert W. Service's songs of travel and adventure and sentiment, well named "Rhymes of a Rolling Stone" ($2 net), which has been brought out by Dodd, Mead with photographic reproductions of many of the scenes described or alluded to. The first poem tells the story of the book:

> There's sunshine in the heart of me,
> My blood sings in the breeze;
> The mountains are a part of me,
> I'm fellow to the trees.
> My golden youth I'm squandering,
> Sun-libertine am I;
> A-wandering, a-wandering,
> Until the day I die.

Walt Whitman's "Leaves of Grass" appears in handsome holiday colors (Dutton; $6 net). As the text for her illustrations Margaret Cook, the artist, has apparently taken Whitman's verse, "I am the poet of the Body and I am the poet of the Soul," and has attempted to poetize the several stark masculine figures called for by the text by a mirage of colors and blurred outlines; but she has had better success with the figures of women. The cover, which illustrates the title, is most effective, being nothing more than a few sprigs in gilt superimposed upon a background of dull green cloth.

Youthful readers and many who are not so young will find pleasure in the pages of "The Book of the Sagas" (Dutton; $2.50). Even in modern English Thor looks every inch a hero. But the English version, made by Alice S. Hoffman, would be much better if the trick of introducing sentences with "and" had not been overworked and the simplicity of the original Icelandic had not been falsified. The illustrations by Gordon Browne, R. I., several of them in glowing colors, are in themselves worth the price of the book.

Mr. Max Beerbohm has chosen an opportune moment to issue his "Fifty Caricatures" (Dutton; $2 net). Funny and clever at any time, they are delicious at just this season when between the drums and tramplings of Sir Edward Carson and Mrs. Pankhurst English statesmen have taken on a harassed look. Sir Edward Carson himself appears, or rather not himself, being conceived as something like a combination of the devil and a lily pad. But this is the only case in which the artist has permitted symbolic value to blur life-likeness. Outstanding personalities of other nations are represented, such as Caruso, Hauptmann, and Rodin.

A number of illustrations, four of them reproductions in color, may explain the inclusion of Fromentin's "Masters of Past Time" (Dutton; $2.50 net) among the special holiday books. For those who do not know the "Maîtres d'Autrefois" in the original this English version may be recommended.

ASSYRIAN RELIGION.

Die Religion Babyloniens und Assyriens. Von Morris Jastrow, jr. Three volumes. Giessen: Alfred Töpelmann.

In 1898 Professor Jastrow published his "Religion of Babylonia and Assyria," in a series of handbooks on the History of Religion edited by him. In 1902 appeared the first part of a translation of this work into German, under the title, "Die Religion des Babyloniens und Assyriens," a somewhat unusual experience for an American author. In the announcement accompanying the first part of this translation, the complete work was promised in ten parts within a year, revised by the author and brought up to date. As the work progressed this original plan was changed several times, until at last, after eleven years, we have three bulky volumes, together with a portfolio of illustrations, containing in all some 1,800 pages against less than 800 pages in the original. As the pages in the German are considerably larger than those in the English volume, the new German work may be said to be, in the matter of text, three times as large as the original English work. This difference in size is not, however, the only difference between the two books. The last seven chapters, or about one-half of the original English work, dealing with cosmology, myths and legends, future life, temples and ritual, and containing finally a general summing up, are altogether omitted from the German volume, which, in spite of its larger size, is therefore as yet a torso. Dr. Jastrow attempts to present an exhaustive treatment of the omen and magical literature of the Babylonians. Through the first fourteen chapters the difference in contents and in size between the two books is not great—252 pages in the English to 272 pages in the German. It is when he begins to deal with the magical texts that the change takes place. The result is that the book is strangely out of proportion. The first 272 pages, constituting the first half of the first volume, are part of a handbook of the history of the religion, like the original English edition. The remaining two volumes and a half are, in continually increasing ratio, a collection in full or by content of all known magical texts, prayers and hymns, penitential psalms, and more especially oracles and omens of every description, particularly the omens derived from the examination of the liver and the study of the heavens.

As might be expected from the length of time consumed in this immensely painstaking work, with the constant addition of new material as a result of excavations in progress, or new discoveries in old material through decipherment of texts theretofore unknown, Professor Jastrow has undergone various changes of opinion in the process of publication. The pages dealing with the history and relation of the various forms of wedge-shaped writing, in the earlier part of the work, had to be rewritten later, and, similarly, the views first expressed with regard to the Sumerian language, which Professor Jastrow did not believe existed, were changed and modified later, the proof of the existence of that language having become too convincing for him longer to refuse to accept it. With all the wealth of material which he has presented, Dr. Jastrow yet finds himself obliged to apologize in the preface for various omissions, especially a treatise on the Elamite language by Dr. Hüsing, omitted for lack of space, and specimens of purely Sumerian hymns and penitential songs. The latter omission he promises to repair in another work, which is to treat also the material covered in the latter chapters of the original English volume, not included in the present book. We wish, by the way, that in his preface the author had followed Anglo-American rather than German custom, and omitted altogether polemical references to his critics.

Naturally, the relatively disproportionate space allotted in this book to the discussion of omen literature gives the reader the impression that this was the real content of the Babylonian-Assyrian religion, and, in point of fact, in ordinary practice, magic did constitute, during a considerable part of its history certainly, the religion of Babylonia-Assyria, as it did of Egypt. This is evidenced by the great mass of this literature which has been handed down to us. Dr. Jastrow has deserved well of scholars, especially by his study of the omen texts. The more important results of this study have already been noted in the columns of the Nation as the different parts of the work were issued.

To many students, however, and to readers in general, the most interesting and valuable part of this whole publication will prove to be the "Bildermappe zur Religion des Babyloniens und Assyriens," a portfolio of pictures dealing with or in any way illustrating Babylonian religion, 226 illustrations in all, with about 100 pages of text. As in the case of the omen literature, Professor Jastrow has sought to make this pictorial representation of Babylonian-Assyrian religion exhaustive, and he has, in fact, assembled here, if not all, at least all of importance, from the monuments of various sorts, including the seal cylinders. We note a few places in which the collection might have been enlarged to advantage, especially the parts dealing with the temples and ziggurats, and with burial and the future life. In some cases, also, the pictures lack clearness; but, on the whole, Dr. Jastrow has accomplished his difficult task well, and the text accompanying the pictures is, in general, a sane and helpful interpretation of their meaning.

The illustrations from the seal cylinders were selected by Dr. William Hayes Ward, who also wrote the text accompanying. With these explanations and with Dr. Ward's general view of the Babylonian religion and its relation to neighboring cults, we do not find ourselves always able to agree. On page 105 he says: "The genuine Babylonian art has carefully avoided everything obscene," and he accordingly refers the figures of naked goddesses upon the cylinders to northern, particularly Hittite, influence, or ascribes the cylinders to other than Babylonian sources. In point of fact, sexual representations are extremely common in the figurines found in the temples of southern and middle Babylonia in the very earliest period. Indeed, the temples are full of sexual symbols, both male and female, in the earliest period very crude and literal, and gradually assuming conventional forms. One does not need, after examining the remains found in these temples, to read Herodotus's account in order to be convinced that the sexual cult was very pronounced in the Babylonian religion. We think there is more of it on the cylinders than Dr. Ward has realized, although there is less there than in the images and figures to which we have referred. This is not the sort of thing that can be published in extenso, and Dr. Jastrow wisely exhibits very little of it in his pictures. He does, however, recognize its existence in the religious art.

The last volume is provided with most elaborate indices, including a dictionary covering in all almost 150 pages. They represent a colossal industry. One curious geographical error should be corrected in any future edition. The procession of the gods, in plate 98, is described as: "Grosse Felsenskulptur zu Malatia in Anti-Taurusgebirge." The real place is Maltäi, about thirty miles due north of Mosul.

CURRENT FICTION.

Here Are Ladies. By James Stephens. New York: The Macmillan Co.

Mr. Stephens is a poet, and so declared himself by issuing two volumes of verse before. With "The Crock of Gold" he showed mastery of humorous and imaginative prose. That was an unusual book, and the critic could only vaguely range it with "Alice in Wonderland" and "The Water Babies"—which is to say, very much above and beyond books merely conventional or merely clever. "Here Are Ladies" is almost as unusual. The short papers here collected are not quite stories—certainly not "short stories" in the American sense. They are "sketches" rather, scenes and situations presented on their own merits, as Maupassant, for example, often thought them worth presenting. These sketches arrange themselves for the most part in triads, as "Three Heavy Husbands," "Three Women Who Wept," "Three Happy Places," and so on. In most of them Mr. Stephens plays with the perennial subjects of romancer and satirist, women and marriage. But his play is mirthful, seldom merely facetious, and never merely bitter; his humor is that of a poet masking as a satirist. Taken by themselves, some of these pages, like certain episodes in "The Crock of Gold," may shock "the gentle reader," but their extravagance is (to compare small things with great) that of Rabelais rather than that of Swift. A deep vein of romantic feeling underlies all this display of cynicism, and crops up in the intercalary verses which offer so sharp a contrast, on the surface, to the prose text.

Mr. Stephens deals with types rather than persons. For example, the first of his "heavy husbands" is the silent man. Having thoughtlessly exposed himself to matrimony, he looks forward to the wedding ceremony as the beginning of a lifetime of conversation:

It lay, therefore, that he must amend his own hand, and, accordingly, for the purpose of marital intercourse, he began a sad inquiry into the nature of things. The world was so full of things; clouds and winds and sewing-machines, kings and brigands, hats and heads, flower-pots, jam and public-houses—surely one must find a little to chat about at any moment if one were not ambitiously particular.

But the dread moment arrives and he finds himself dumb:

As he sat in the train beside his wife the silence which he so dreaded came upon them. Emptiness buzzed in his head. He sought diligently for something to speak about — the characteristics of objects! There were objects and to spare, but he could not say—"that window is square, it is made of glass," or, "the roof of this carriage is flat, it is made of wood."

Suddenly his wife buried her face in her muff, and her shoulders were convulsed. . . .

Love and contrition possessed him on the instant. He eased his husky throat, and the dreaded, interminable conversation began—"What are you crying for, my dear?" said he.

Her voice, smothered by the fur, replied: "I am not crying, darling," said she; "I am only laugbing."

Perhaps the real charm and strength of the book lie in the fact that it is a man's book; a book free of the drawing-room conventions, decent or indecent, which now obsess our fiction; a book with the free and hearty voice of one honest man speaking to another in his shop or at his club.

Pelle the Conqueror: Boyhood. By Martin Anderson Nexö. Translated from the Danish by Jessie Muir. New York: Henry Holt & Co.

When this first of the four parts of this novel appeared some seven years ago, its author was hardly known even in little Denmark. Now he is famous there; and as his work has the sturdy human quality, which is of all qualities most likely to weather the risks of translation, we see no reason why he may not reach a world-wide audience. He writes from his heart and his experience. Like his hero, he fought his way up from the humblest origin and the least promising conditions to a place of dignity and influence.

Pelle is the conqueror, because he is born, and never ceases to be, the captain of his soul. Nexö, like Pelle, passed his boyhood on the prosperous little island of Bornholm in the Baltic, where work and fair pay offered themselves to the starving farm laborers of Sweden and Denmark. Pelle is hardly more than a child when his old father brings him to Bornholm. They find a foothold upon one of the larger farms, and there, however precariously, they stick throughout Pelle's boyhood. Stone Farm is a little world in itself; we hardly step beyond it in the course of these pages. The master, Kongstrup, is a big, thriving, earthy fellow, kind enough to his men, but a devastator among women. Life at Stone Farm involves much of the savagery, the wreaking of primitive emotions, which our newspapers gloat over, and our novelists (perhaps wisely) ignore. This writer neither gloats nor glozes over the simple facts of rural life, as he has learned them from experience. His people of Bornholm are uncouth, unclean, lewd, but, above all, human and lovable, if not likable. No figure among them is less imposing or even respectable than Pelle's father, poor old Lasse, with his bragging cowardice, his belated gallantry, his innate feebleness of mind and soul. And yet there is something infinitely touching and even engaging about him. This ineffective, prattling, tippling drudge among the cowsheds has a heart of his own, and blood in his veins. Pelle, the young and strong, loves him. Their parting, when the time comes for Pelle to set out upon his great adventure, wrings them both, almost speechless though it be.

Pelle held out his hand. "Good-by and thank you, fatber—for all your kindness!" he added gently.

"Yes, yes; yes, yes!" said Lasse, shaking his head. It was all he was able to say.

He went out with Pelle past the outhouses, and there stopped, while Pelle went on along tbe dikes with his sack on his back, up towards the highroad. Two or three times he turned and nodded; Lasse, overcome, stood gazing, with his hand shading his eyes. He had never looked so old before. . . .

Now Lasse turned and went in. How forlorn he looked! Pelle felt a quick desire to throw down the sack and run back and say something nice to him; but before he could do so the impulse had disappeared upon the fresb morning breeze. His feet carried him on upon the straight way, away, away. . . .

Sons and Lovers. By D. H. Lawrence. New York: Mitchell Kennerley.

It is hard to see why the author chose the coal fields of Derbyshire as his setting, and for his hero the son of a miner, unless, indeed, he wished to imply that the free thinking and free living of a certain fashionable London society have penetrated, like the tango and the victrola, to the lower classes. The story will leave a gloomy impression on most readers. It is too strongly grasped and wrought out to be negligible, and will force many, in spite of themselves, to accept it as a true picture. As to the general background, there can be no question that the writer has his eye on the object. Life in the Morel household, hard as it is, is no more severe than an occasional miner's wife has to contend with. Mrs. Morel is obliged not only to wring enough from her hard-drinking husband to make both ends meet, but to bear him children in rapid succession; and the early chapters also relate her struggle to maintain the ideals to which before marriage she has been accustomed. In this battle lies the book's real charm and pathos. The mother's relation to her children, especially two sons, is described with the firm knowledge that brings conviction.

The second son, Paul Morel, is the central character of the story. Having learned to paint, though he continues in a clerkship throughout the book, he is promptly endowed by the author with all the heartache expected of great genius. He loves Miriam, the attractive daughter of a farmer, yet cannot marry her because she is too shadowy. Instead, he claims her body, and, passion having cooled, is convinced that his soul requires pastures new. He has a similar and more extended relation with a young married woman living apart from her husband, and again interprets the vicissitudes of physical desire in spiritual terms. At length his mother dies, after long-drawn-out suffering with cancer; rather, her actual end is accomplished by him by means of an overdose of morphia, intended, one must believe, not only to relieve her anguish, but his own as well. Then nothing is left for him. Miriam offers to marry him, but he refuses, and walks forth into the night.

Paul's "affairs" are the indulgence of an egotist, whose egotism has no large transforming power.

"LABBY."

The Life of Henry Labouchere. By Algar Labouchere Thorold. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $4.50 net.

This is a book of varied and sustained interest, but somehow fails to be completely satisfying. This fact, however, may be a subtle recommendation. A life that was, in some senses, manqué, does not go ill with a biography that here and there is broken and disappointing. The work is full and conscientious, though occasionally marred by carelessness; it is quite without hero-worship or family pride; but it is a thing of sections and glances rather than a consistent and unified whole. But so, too, was Labouchere.

Mr. Thorold quietly assumes that he was "the greatest English wit since Sheridan." This might be challenged on several grounds. It would be like "Labby" to challenge it by remarking that Sheridan was Irish and Labouchere was French. Such he indubitably was not only by descent but by cast of mind and aptitude of expression. The crisp turn of his epigrams and paradoxes reached

London by way of the Seine. One of them is well said to be inconceivable as coming from lips right English. It was his saying of a Parliamentary colleague—Bradlaugh, of course—that "the mere denial of the existence of God did not entitle a man's opinion to be taken without scrutiny on matters of greater importance." This is one of the class of utterances which led some to dub Labouchere Voltairian. The resemblance is not thoroughgoing. But the quality of whimsical cynicism was bred in his French blood. He began to be audacious with his tongue in boyhood, and kept it up until almost literally the day of his death. A few hours before his end at Florence, an attendant upset a spirit-lamp by his bedside. Labouchere was startled out of his comatose condition, noted the glow, and said, "Flames? Not yet, I think," and quizzically laughed himself off to sleep. It recalls the Talleyrand story of the "souffrances de l'enfer" and "Quoi, déjà?"

Labouchere warmed his hands at many different fires of life. He was fond of travel, dabbled at the diplomatic career a few years, until his superiors could no longer put up with his freakish impudence; was for a time in Mexico, thought he admired the United States—if he had lived here, Heaven knows what he would have said about us—was theatrical manager, journalist, Radical member of Parliament, and free lance in all. His escapades were as numerous as his witticisms. Both were doubtless fathered upon him, after the fashion of giving such things to him that hath. He himself had an embroidering memory; some of his early adventures, as he loved to recount them in smoking-rooms or write them out in Truth, lost nothing in the frequent retelling. Many of them are set forth in these pages, and make amusing reading. They have been quoted endlessly —especially his retorts and verbal quips, which we are asked to believe were never stair-case wit. But, indeed, the evidence is ample that Labouchere was extraordinarily ready, as he was amazingly adroit. And his manner is said to have been perfect. His whimsicalities were uttered with quiet deliberation, and his most terrifying audacities were accompanied by an air of bland simplicity. This no doubt helped to give him his reputation in the House of Commons, where his set speeches were less attended to than his guerrilla interventions in debate. In the latter he was unexcelled for airy banter, for witty characterization, and for deft puncturing of pomposity.

The points at which Labouchere touched public life are clearly indicated by the author. As part proprietor of the Daily News, Labouchere found himself in Paris in 1870, sent away the regular French correspondent, himself stayed through the siege and got out his letters by balloon. His work as observer and reporter was capital and brought him deserved fame. The other journalistic repute—if such it was—which he won was as owner and editor of Truth. Its present editor, Mr. Bennett, furnishes a chapter detailing Labouchere's insouciant connection with that picturesque toy—for such the publication long was to him. That a thing which he took up for amusement came to bring him in a good deal of money which he did not need, only added to the piquancy of the experience. His best labor he long gave to politics, until successive disappointments made him somewhat out of humor with public life. Party interest reached its highest in him about 1886, when he was doing his best to persuade Chamberlain to support Irish Home Rule and thereafter make himself Radical Prime Minister. The letters which passed between the two at that crisis are of more historical interest than anything else in the volume. We see here that Chamberlain was nearer than had been supposed to agreeing to a modified Irish bill. But at the last moment he shied off, and Labouchere never forgave him. Nor did he ever expect again to live to see a Radical party triumphant.

This was his greatest political disillusion. Next to it came Gladstone's refusal to invite him into the Cabinet in 1880, and Rosebery's to send him as Minister to Washington. The reasons are not very clearly given. Probably the deepest one was that Labouchere was not really taken by the English as a serious man. This is not to say that he was not sincere. Yet for a man born rich, a cosmopolitan, a professed wit, to announce himself a Radical of the deepest jet, was a little too much for the ordinary Englishman. He could not help suspecting a pose. He joined in the chuckles provoked by the man, yet, after all, could not get over thinking of him as "Our Labby." So it was that the highest ambitions were necessarily frustrated. Yet Labouchere was not embittered. He kept a brave and smiling front to the world. Nor was his final retirement to Florence a retreat. Buying Michael Angelo's villa, he turned it inside out with refittings, observing that "old Michael knew nothing about the comforts of a modern establishment, and it was time that he should learn them." There he passed his last years, surviving, in a way, his own reputation, but kept warm to the end by enduring friendships.

Our Eternity. By Maurice Maeterlinck. Translated by Alexander Teixeira de Mattos. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co. $1.50 net.

The good fortune of Maeterlinck in his translators continues undiminished: an English Maeterlinck, if such existed, would propose few emendations in the limpid, fluid, and undulant prose of Mr. Alexander Teixeira de Mattos's version of "La Mort," now republished in a revised and much enlarged edition; for the grisly title, "Death," the grandiose "Our Eternity" (Dodd, Mead) has been substituted.

Maeterlinck opens his argument by distinguishing the moment of death, the articulus mortis, from its formidable concomitants and environs, sickness, physical corruption, and retributive torment—discriminations logically sound, but put forth with a little more complacence than belongs properly to the mere act of "rectifying the frontiers" of a definition. In a chapter partly derived from a former essay, "L'Immortalité," he proceeds to demonstrate the unlikelihood of the permanent survival of the ego; the eternization of that trickle of memory in which he finds the frail and insubstantial nucleus of the ego impresses him as unreasonable. The logic in this section is subtle and astute, though, in deprecation of the emphasis on memory, a critic might suggest that what we demand in a future life is not so much continuity as proprietorship, the warmth and intimacy celebrated by William James, and that the difficulty in dissociating the two is a mere accident of our temporal existence.

The new chapters, iv-viii, deal with theosophy, psychical research, and reincarnation. Maeterlinck's expertness in dialectic is really remarkable in a master of intuition, and his perfect craftsmanship is shown in the ease with which he adapts the spare and meagre syllogism—so prone, from Euclid to Macaulay, to the use of detached, staccato forms—to the sweep of his own flexible and vibrant periods. His wariness in the matter of so-called manifestations is truly admirable, and will surprise only those who have failed to consider that the mystical imagination, which is his prime faculty, is adverse to that appetite for signs and tokens which drives the unimaginative to séances suggestive of the recognition scenes at the winding-up of a Plautine or Terentian comedy. There is an amenity in Macterlinck's incredulity that is almost without precedent; the burly, aggressive skepticism of Huxley and the feline Gibboncsque skepticism were both familiar to us, but the genuinely humane, the winning, caressing skepticism that emanates from Saint Wandrille is almost a literary novelty. The author notes that spirits are loquacious as to the old life, but reticent as to the new, and doubts if experiment has educed any facts inexplicable by the aid of telepathy, clairvoyance, and suggestion.

There follow two curious chapters on The Two Aspects of Infinity and Our Fate in these Infinities, In which the old distinction between being and becoming, the resting and the flowing universe, is expounded with an eloquence which, in its common leaning towards the sidereal and the metaphysical infinite, recalls the speculations of Plotinus. In these roamings of the adventurous imagination on the high seas of thought, Maeterlinck shows the enterprise, the zest, the controlled exultation, of the true explorer, and his inability to find a port (a failure which evokes in him an austere joy) provides new occasions for the exhibitions of his seamanship. It is hardly to be wondered at if, in these careerings through infinity, his particular theme seems almost to undergo that submergence which he foresees for the human personality.

In the final chapter, Conclusions, after hesitating between the two theories of a consciousness modified beyond recognition, even self-recognition, and absorption in the cosmic consciousness, Maeterlinck inclines very tentatively to the latter. In the one point in which he manifests a premature and indiscreet certainty, his temperament has got the better of his logic. He insists that in this new existence we cannot be unhappy, since we should be parts of infinity, and a self-torturing infinite is inconceivable. The fortitude that enables the universe to put up with the toothaches and heartaches in the section of infinity known as earth is left without explanation.

The book as a whole will consolidate, if it does not raise, the reputation of its author. The presumptions of fragility and tenuity in the thought which a hasty reasoner might deduce from the aerial and exquisite style are not verified by a scrutiny of the logic. Without technical completeness or basic originality, the work merits the praise of impartial temper, an alert critical spirit, acute and circumspect reasoning, duly circumscribed and wisely tentative conclusions.

Early Memories. By Henry Cabot Lodge. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50 net.

"The world of Boston, when I opened my eyes upon it," writes Senator Lodge in the course of what he hints is the first instalment of an autobiography, "was a very small and simple world as I look back at it now in the glare and noise of the twentieth century. There was an abundance of gayety, but expenditures were small. Everybody knew everybody else and all about everybody else's family. Most people were related, for in the small colonial communities of the eighteenth century the established families had intermarried in a manner most bewildering even to the trained genealogist. Yet the extreme familiarity and ease of intercourse which I now observe among young men and young women entirely unrelated did not then exist. However intimate people might be, a certain formality of address was thought to be demanded by good manners." This selection is characteristic of the volume, in which comment and airing of views accompany, sometimes clog, the narrative. Three pages are required to express Senator Lodge's abhorrence of the excessive magnanimity of some Northerners, who in their zeal virtually confess the justice of the position of the South in the Civil War. The expansion in the size and power of fortunes also is a text for a long discussion; and the hurry of our time, with its consequences for the art of letter-writing and form in general, distresses the Senator greatly.

It is all the more interesting, therefore, to come upon a note which an Englishman, Henry Greville, made in his diary in 1858, when the future United States Senator was eight years old. Wrote Greville: "An amusing letter from Fanny Kemble, dated Nahant, U. S. (a favorite sea-bathing place near Boston), received to-day, says: 'How you would open your eyes and stop your ears if you were here! This enormous house is filled with American women, one prettier than the other, who look like fairies, dress like duchesses or femmes entretenues, behave like housemaids, and scream like peacocks.'" This is sufficient evidence of Senator Lodge's judicial attitude towards the era of his childhood, and, indeed, he expressly denies being a laudator temporis acti. Yet a reader of a book of reminiscences may be forgiven for wishing a maximum of memories and a minimum of moralizing.

Of memories, there are, nevertheless, a goodly supply, and of a character for which one must be grateful. Although the story stops with its narrator's entrance into public life, its continuance so far is enough to include a list of famous names like those of Rufus Choate, Evarts, Sumner, Phillips, Gov. Andrew, Motley, Parkman, Bancroft, Longfellow, Lowell, Holmes, and Emerson. Not all of the best anecdotes are about the immortals. It was Dr. Bigelow, for instance, who was suggested by Lodge's father as the final court of appeal, when Lodge and some of his youthful friends, having announced their intention of going in swimming immediately after a heavy luncheon, found that their notions of the proper time for violent exercise ran counter to those of their elders. The boys went to the doctor, and put their question. He looked at them with a quizzical smile, and said: "I should not do it myself, but nothing hurts boys. Yes, you may go in." Sure enough, no evil results followed. One of the epigrams of Francis E. Parker, the lawyer, is worth quoting. Of a friend whom he in reality loved, he remarked: "If he had lived in the Middle Ages, he would have gone to the stake for a principle under a misapprehension as to the facts." Upon the occasion of a dinner for Porfirio Diaz, a Mexican Senator asked Lodge what he thought of the guest of honor. Lodge answered that he looked rather stern, as if he would not hesitate to shoot an enemy before breakfast. "Shoot an enemy!" exclaimed the Mexican. "I have known him to shoot three hundred enemies before breakfast."

There is a certain timeliness in one of the anecdotes about Evarts. On going to the polling-place in New York one election-day, he was told by the election clerk that Mr. Evarts had already voted. "Has he, indeed?" said the lawyer, pleasantly, as if there were no such thing as fraud in an election. "I hope he voted right." Sumner was not a wit, but there was keenness in a remark he made to Gambetta, after the two men had been discussing the situation in France. "Ah, M. Sumner," said the French leader, "il nous faut un Jefferson!" Sumner replied: "Trouvez un Washington, M. Gambetta, et un Jefferson arrivera." And, finally, there is the happy description made by Lowell, upon a Commencement Day, of one of the early benefactors of Harvard: "There is William Pennoyer, of whom we know nothing except that he comes down to us in the most graceful of attitudes with his hand in his pocket."

Nothing is of greater interest in a life story than the turning-points. As it happens, Senator Lodge can put his finger upon the influences that determined him to become a public man and writer. He grew up without much thought of what he should be and do. It was not necessary that he should earn his bread; and no particular spirit of ambition had been aroused in him when, a few weeks after his graduation from Harvard, he set out for Europe with his bride. That winter, in Rome, he found a classmate, named Simpson. This man also was wealthy, but was possessed of a longing to give his life to literature and public service. Association with him fired Lodge with the same determination. A few weeks after they had parted, Lodge heard of his death, whereupon he wrote of his new idea to Henry Adams, whose course in mediæval history in Lodge's senior year had been his first stimulus "to anything resembling active thought." Adams replied encouragingly, and a year later, when he became editor of the North American Review, made Lodge his assistant. While engaged in this work, Lodge went through the Harvard Law School. He was then appointed a lecturer at Harvard in American history, which position he held for three years, resigning it in 1879. The next year he was elected to the Massachusetts House of Representatives, and began his political career.

Familiar Spanish Travels. By W. D. Howells. New York: Harper & Bros. $2 net.

Those who have read "My Literary Passions" will recall Mr. Howells's youthful enthusiasm for "Don Quixote," "Lazarillo de Tormes," and other masterpieces of Spanish fiction. In later years he found kindred spirits in writers like Palacio Valdés and Pérez Galdós, whose realism, like his own, is relieved by abundant humor and an optimistic outlook upon life. It is surprising, therefore, that Mr. Howells waited until his seventy-fourth year before visiting a land in which he had long dwelt in imagination, and which meant so much to his friends, Longfellow, Lowell, and Hay. Readers of the present volume will rejoice that in his case Spain did not prove to be the unattainable Carcassonne.

His tour was the conventional one embracing Burgos, Valladolid, Madrid, the Escorial, Toledo, Cordova, Seville, Granada, Ronda, and Algeciras. He never strayed from the beaten track. All told he lingered only six weeks in Spain. We have, therefore, that comparative novelty: a book of Spanish travels, the author of which does not pose as an authority or a romantic adventurer. And yet Mr. Howells had his adventures, of the same comfortable sort so often experienced by his own fictitious personages. Not even one who travels first-class by the Sud-Express and frequents, when possible, the double-starred hotels, can quite escape them in a land where, like the Knight of the Rueful Countenance, "we may plunge our hands up to the elbows in what they call adventures." And when in Spain adventures fail, there are always misadventures for the traveller to fall back upon. Happily, Mr. Howells experienced none of the latter more serious than his cold reception in Burgos, where he sat shivering beside a steamless radiator, and his failure to draw upon his letter of credit after a wait of several hours in a Valladolid bank. We cannot help thinking that if he had put up at a humbler hotel he might have basked before a comforting brazier. One always pays dearly for luxury in Spain. And was he, we may ask, playing the part of a Roman in Rome when he expected a Spanish banker to honor a letter of credit on the very day when it was presented?

Mr. Howells's experiences make excellent copy. He is plainly most interested in human types and the trivial incidents of travel. The reader must not expect him to go into ecstasies over the Alhambra. He wisely refrains from attempting to out-Irving Irving. Instead, he disarms criticism by confining his narrative to his own personal experiences. Mr. Howells's powers of close observation have not diminished with years. Every travelling-companion, cabman, servant, and blind beggar whom he met was made the subject of sympathetic study. In describing these types his genial humor and kindly philosophy find free play. On the whole, Spain has left upon him a pleasant impression. He experienced no more disillusion than was to have been expected. The title is well chosen. Writer and reader meet on familiar terms, and on ending the book one feels that one has himself made a pleasant tour in delightful company. Drawings by Norman Irving Black and Walter Hale add attractiveness.

Great Debates in American History. From the Debates in the British Parliament on the Colonial Stamp Act (1764-1765) to the Debates in Congress at the Close of the Taft Administration (1912-1913). Edited by Marion Mills Miller. 14 vols. New York: The Current Literature Publishing Co.

This collection is a very different sort of thing from a set of "The World's Best Orations." In those, the speeches are isolated, and are read as much for their literary as their political values. The present undertaking is rather to be compared with Benton's "Abridgment of the Debates of Congress from 1789 to 1856." The speeches are grouped by subject; sometimes they are quoted in full, sometimes in part, sometimes merely summarized, and the historical circumstances of their delivery are given, together with some account of the development of the legislation which they influenced. The word "debates" is interpreted in these volumes in a broad sense, as they include a digest of the Federalist, the Dred Scott decision, partly verbatim, partly in summary, and Lincoln's Gettysburg address.

Each volume has an introduction in the form of a paper on some matter of public interest, although not all of these were written for this series. From an address of Senator Lodge, for instance, is drawn "The Constitution and Its Makers"; from one by Charles Francis Adams, "The Doctrine of Equality and the Race Problem"; and from one by President Van Hise, "Control of Trusts by Commission." Among the others who contribute introductions are Woodrow Wilson, Walter H. Page, Henry Watterson, Ida M. Tarbell, President Hadley, and Senator Burton. Each volume is illustrated with a photogravure of a public man or public event, such as Patrick Henry delivering the "liberty or death" speech, or Lincoln signing the Emancipation Proclamation, and also with reproductions of cartoons. In the preface is a selected bibliography of collections of American speeches. There are two indexes, one of persons and one of subjects.

A work of this kind, done at all well, cannot but be exceedingly useful. As evidence of his industry, the editor lets us know that he leafed every page in the records of Congressional debate, and that these contain two billion words. Better proof, not only of his industry, but of his judgment, is to be found in the text of the volumes resulting from this truly terrifying survey of verbosity. To take an example, the Webster-Hayne debate is introduced with a summary of its parliamentary history, while for a further discussion of the subject of public lands, out of which the debate arose, the reader is referred to debates on the homestead laws in a subsequent volume. After a brief description, in the language of contemporaries, of the scene when Webster arose to make his reply, we have the preliminary debate on "Consolidation," the debate proper on "Disunion by Nullification," with a cross-reference to a digest of Madison's "Report on the Virginia Resolutions," cited by Hayne, the latter's almost forgotten rebuttal speech to Webster's great effort, and, finally, Benton's caustic commentary of a few days later upon the position of the Massachusetts Senator.

The subjects treated range from the Stamp Act and the supremacy of Parliament as discussed in both England and America through State rights and the tariff, including Canadian reciprocity, to child labor, pure food, woman suffrage, and the regulation of railway rates. All of these are arranged for the investigator with conscientious intelligence. The volumes put at the disposal of the student a mass of material, much of which has hitherto been buried so deep as to repel every one but the most persistent.

Notes

Macmillans will have ready shortly "The Philippines," by Dean C. Worcester.

Count Ilya Tolstoy has arranged for the publication on both sides of the Atlantic of an English translation of his recollections of his late father.

The Rev. J. P. Mahaffy has been appointed vice-provost of Trinity College, Dublin. Professor Dowden's place in the same college has been filled by Mr. William Fitz John Trench, formerly professor of English literature in Queen's College, Galway.

Henry Holt & Company announce that they are about to publish the January issue of a new quarterly, to be called the Unpopular Review. In the mind of the editor "there is great need for the dissemination of some disagreeable truths." The prospectus states that

Most of the fallacies now popular depend upon vague notions that the republic can prosper with one law for the rich and another for the poor; that something can be had for nothing; that it is unnecessary to better the man in order permanently to better his estate; that the march of progress should be tuned to the pace of the slowest; that policies can rise higher than their source, and that wisdom can be attained by the counting of noses.

Though fault-finding will be a necessary part of its policy, the Review "will dwell upon remedies more gladly than defects, and . . . will be optimistic—spontaneously, though cautiously, optimistic." The titles of the articles in the first issue will be: "The New Irrepressible Conflict," "The Majority Juggernaut," "The Democrat Reflects," "The New Morality," "Professor Bergson and Psychical Research," "Two Neglected Virtues," "The Unfermented Cabinet," "A Needed Unpopular Reform," "Our Tobacco: Its Cost," "Our Alcohol: Its Use," "The Microbophobiac," "The Standing Incentives to War," "The Machinery for Peace," "En Casserole—Short Pieces on Tobacco and Alcohol, Answering Big Questions, Decency and the Stage, What's the Matter with Our Colleges? Proportionate News, Simplified Spelling."

Mr. M. A. de Wolfe Howe calls our attention to an error in a footnote in Norton's "Letters" (corrected in a later printing of the book) which was copied in the essay on Norton in the Nation of last week. "Instead of saying that John Adams and John Quincy Adams were both descended from John Quincy, the note should have ascribed this descent to John Quincy Adams only. John Quincy was his mother's ancestor, not his father's."

The Boston Public Library has issued a second revised edition of its "List of Books for Boys and Girls." It includes authors, titles, and subjects in a single alphabetical arrangement, the subjects being intended to meet requirements of the schools and to cover the range of children's interest. There are about 4,500 entries in the list, the alertness of which is indicated by the fact that there are references to fourteen Boy Scout books.

We have received from the Clarendon Press the twentieth edition of the "Oxford University Handbook," which is the students' handbook revised to September, 1913.

"The Complete Poems of Paul Laurence Dunbar" have been issued by Dodd, Mead & Co., in a single volume, with W. D. Howells's introduction to "Lyrics of Lowly Life."

The poetical works of Oscar Wilde have been added to Crowell's Astor edition of the poets, with a biographical introduction by Nathan Haskell Dole.

The Oxford University Press announces the publication of "English Church Architecture," by Francis Bond, author of "Gothic Architecture in England." The work is of an introductory character, such as is required by the general reader with no previous knowledge of the subject. It is fully equipped with glossaries and indexes, and contains 1,400 reproductions of photographs, sketches, measured drawings, plans, and sections. It is in two volumes, demy quarto.

It is not perfectly clear from the preface to the Highways and Byways volume, "In the Border," just what portion, if any, of the actual writing was done by Andrew Lang and how much was left to his brother John Lang. Apparently both brothers had been gathering material together, but the composition is entirely the work of the survivor. This, however, is a matter of curiosity only. As it stands, the book is worthy of the unvaryingly excellent series which Macmillans have had the good fortune to carry through. Whether this account of the Borderland is as interesting to a particular reader as the other volumes have been, will depend on the attraction for him of the dour deeds of the Douglases and Percys and their like, compared with the more civilized literary traditions that prevail in the Southern counties. But there is humor, too, in Mr. Lang's pages, besides the romance of ruthless feuds. As an example of this we may cite the story of the exciseman from the Highlands who used to sit under the nose of the Rev. Mr. Ramsay of Kelso, and scribble notes during the sermon with a keel-o-vine (pencil). Pausing in his discourse one day, and looking straight at the offender, the preacher cried: "My brethren, I tell ye, except ye be born again, it is as impossible for you to enter the Kingdom of Heaven as it is for a Hielander no to be a thief! Man wi' the keel-o-vine, do ye hear that?" As might be expected, the book has much to say of trout fishing, but generally in a tone of lamentation for factory-polluted streams and glories that have departed.

It may seem desirable on many accounts to include a life of Jane Austen in the English Men of Letters series (Macmillan), but it is unfortunate that the author of this volume, Mr. Francis Warre Cornish, should have been so recently preceded by the excellent and official biography from the hands of Mr. William Austen Leigh and Mr. Richard A. Austen Leigh (noticed in the Nation, October 2, 1913). There was really nothing left for Mr. Cornish to say in the way of biography, and he has, possibly for that reason, devoted most of his chapters to a running comment on the novels. Here his criticism of the characters is shrewd and has the pleasant flavor of talk about people with whom one is intimately acquainted, but one cannot take much interest in the analysis of the plots. In attempting to reproduce the atmosphere of the country life which surrounded Jane Austen, it may be objected that Mr. Cornish rather overdraws. "The depth of Steventon leisure [a vile phrase] is indicated," he exclaims, "by the fact that Mr. Austen used to read Cowper aloud to his family in the morning." Such leisure seems to Mr. Cornish, looking from the superiority of a generation accustomed "to enhance life by locomotion," to be mere "vacuity."

"London: An Intimate Picture" (McBride), is an attractive title, but the author, Mr. H. J. Forman, unhappily fails to live up to its promise. As one reads, the dull conviction grows that this sort of thing has been done before, and done better. The author confesses himself an ardent lover of London, and we are glad to take him at his word; but not all ardent lovers have the gift to > frame love ditties passing rare

and we can only regret that Mr. Forman's achievement should fall short of the excellence of his intentions. To be intimate, one must be sympathetic, and sympathy is the quality that appears to be especially lacking in Mr. Forman's descriptions. He faithfully tells us who lived in such and such a house, and frequently adds some historical data concerning the place or the personage; but this is not intimacy. Even when he comes to such a house of tragedy as Lady Hamilton's he will hardly pause in his businesslike progress down Piccadilly. Despite the presence of a chapter devoted to the Atmosphere of London and tributes to London's rains and fogs, "atmosphere" is exactly that which this book conspicuously lacks. That indefinable quality is only to be subtly conveyed and may not be consciously created. So far as the author's descriptions of London go, they are conscientious and accurate, but intimate they certainly are not. "I fear this is becoming a catalogue," he says, apologizing for his account of St. Paul's Cathedral. A similar apology might be made for other chapters.

Intimate knowledge of the matters considered is evident on every page of "The Carolina Mountains," by Margaret W. Morley (Houghton Mifflin). The varying atmospheric effects in the "Land of the Sky" and the "Sapphire Country," the customs and speech of the natives, the roads and the rivers, birds and flowers, Asheville and the moonshiners, are presented to the reader with a quiet enthusiasm that keeps the account of them from becoming either a catalogue or a mere exercise in rhetoric. In addition, glimpses are given of vanished or vanishing modes of life. So wide is the range of things comprehended within the writer's scheme that we are told of so exotic a development as Biltmore, with, however, much more attention to the effect of the estate upon the economic life of those in reach of its influence than we get from the ordinary travel book. The volume is a little larger than is necessary, as some history and reflections are included that one finds oneself skipping. Mention should be made of the two dozen illustrations, almost all of which are from photographs by the author.

Oliver Huckel's "Through England with Tennyson" (Crowell) suggests by its title a not too serious or profound series of sketches. Indeed, these visits to literary shrines were executed with admirable facility and dispatch, with the apparent object of "doing" the Tennyson country in one short summer. Naturally some places, such as Dozmare (in this book called "Dozemary") Pool among the hills and bogs of Cornwall, were not visited at all. But such omissions can hardly perturb an author who cherishes no ambition of making an original contribution to knowledge. The quotations and accounts that fill the volume are largely taken from a single source, Hallam Tennyson's "Memoir." The reference is seldom more explicit than "I also remembered having read somewhere," or "Some one has said." Sometimes it is more definite but misleading. In describing Tennyson's honeymoon at Coniston Lake he writes: "In this diary he [Tennyson] says of her [his wife]: 'I have known many women who were excellent, one in one way, another in another way, but this woman is the noblest woman I have ever known.'" Now Hallam Tennyson, from whose account the saying is taken without acknowledgment, quotes it from a MS. of Aubrey de Vere as a remark of the poet to his friend while puffing a pipe in intimate converse.

This holiday irresponsibility characterizes also Mr. Huckel's discussion of Tennyson's poetry. The influence of surroundings on his poetry is of course too exacting a subject of investigation to be entered upon. The material of his poems must be dealt with in a romantic and nebulous manner. Of the ruins at Tintagel Mr. Huckel innocently remarks: "Some investigators contend that they cannot be quite so ancient as King Arthur's day." Our author is an adept on subjects where mistakes are difficult. We read with wonder that Tennyson "was engaged on the 'Idylls of the King' for thirty years of his life." He then proceeds to enumerate "The Lady of Shalott" and "Morte d'Arthur," which certainly date from 1832 and 1833 respectively. He concludes: "In 1885 he completed the 'Idylls' by publishing 'Balin and Balan,' 'Geraint and Enid,' and 'The Marriage of Geraint,' which was really the first idyll of 'Enid' divided in two and completed." The facts are that "Balin and Balan" was published in 1885, but "Enid" had been divided in two parts, numbered i and ii, in 1884 under the title "Geraint and Enid." The titles for the separate parts were not introduced till 1888. To achieve these inaccuracies requires no special ingenuity, but to make thirty years stretch from 1832 to 1885 is not an ordinary feat. Erroneous statements and misleading conceptions about the most popular poet of the nineteenth century might be viewed with a more tolerant eye if the narrative bore any special charm of personal experience or wholesome enthusiasm for the great poet.

"The Russian Ballet," by A. E. Johnson (Houghton Mifflin), is a sumptuous holiday volume intended as a souvenir of the much-admired performances of the Russian dancers. There are numerous illustrations, many of them full page and colored, by René Bull. A brief history of the ballet introduces the volume, which includes the plots of seventeen of the most popular dances brought forward by Anna Pavlowa and the other Russians. With some recent additions to their répertoire the author is displeased, because of a tendency to "abandon discipline and to run riot, achieving nothing and arriving nowhere."

From San Francisco (Paul Elder & Company) comes an exceptionally handsome volume, "The Old Missions of California," intended to be "a book as fine as the printer's art can make it." The missions are described in the order of their founding, and the author, Paul Elder, has culled facts from the writings of the fathers themselves and from a score of volumes relating to them, including the exhaustive work, in several volumes, of Father Zephyrin Engelhardt, now in process of publication. Among the illustrations are more than fifty duo-tone reproductions of photographs taken by Western artists.

In all parts of Africa the influences of civilization are such that the primitive life, customs, and beliefs of the natives are fast disappearing. The record of these matters, especially with reference to the negro, is found in Donald Fraser's "Winning a Primitive People" (Dutton). A member of the Livingstonia Mission, he came in 1896 to West Nyasa, which was then almost unchanged by contact with the Western world. On the high plateau to the west of the lake Nyasa lived two typical races, the Ngoni and the Tumbuka. The one was a conglomerate of robust warrior tribes who had invaded the region from the south, the other was a weak and effeminate race whom they found there and had made their slaves. The sole occupation of the one was raiding, of the other to find shelter in the impenetrable forest. From his own experiences among them, Mr. Fraser is able to give a vivid picture of early conditions. In his pages we see communities passing from indolence, ignorance, superstition, and lawlessness into thrift, intelligence, and well-ordered life. Where twenty-five years ago no native had seen a book, or could count accurately beyond ten, there are now "250 schools and 15,000 scholars. There are 500 natives engaged in the work of teaching, and thousands of others who can read. They have schoolbooks, and pamphlets, religious books, and above all, the Bible in the Ngoni and the New Testament in the Tumbuka language." All this has been accomplished by the missionaries, aided since 1904 by the paternal oversight of the British Government. The book contains 27 reproductions of photographs and two maps.

Marshall Monroe Kirkman's "History of Alexander the Great" (Chicago: Cropley Phillips Co.) is a large volume sumptuously bound and adorned with illustrations that are purely imaginary but enlivening. Fully a third of his narrative is mere panegyric, and the shade of Alexander, who sighed for a Homer, ought now to be appeased. Not that we share the author's belief that Alexander nowadays is popularly regarded as a "monster of blood and wine: a man of degraded personality whose unbridged (sic) passions and gross appetites overcame in him all sense of reason and justice"; or that his reputation for intemperance "has destroyed the interest the multitude would otherwise feel in his personality." Even in our abstemious age we have not come to that. It is true that Niebuhr and Grote, with their eyes fixed on the glory that was Greece, and the achievements of the Athenian democracy, devoted much space to proving that Alexander was a filibustering barbarian who crushed the liberties of Greece. But who reads Niebuhr? And not even to Grote does the general reader turn for his conception, vague as it is, of the surpassing personality of Alexander. The Alexander the Great of the popular imagination, however there enshrined, may be trusted to keep down the Alexander of critical historians who insist on permanence as a test of genuine achievement. Even President Wheeler's scholarly book in the Heroes of the Nations series, with its severely archæological illustrations, so different from Mr. Kirkman's elephants and scenery, makes the best of such incidents as the murder of Cleitus. But he does not go so far as Mr. Kirkman, who declares that it was "an execcutive act," coldly calculated and to be approved by prudent men. Mr. Kirkman will hardly admit that Alexander died too young, lest anything should seem imperfect in that "superhuman" and "godlike" career. In spite of these absurdities, Alexander's story is here well told, and while the average boy could not be induced to read President Wheeler's book with its careful analysis of all the conditions in Greece and the East, he will read Mr. Kirkman's rapid pages, and sympathize with his hero-worship.

We greatly fear that Prof. Henry C. Emery's "Politician, Party, and People" (Yale University Press) will be misunderstood by a good many of those who may happen to read it. The book, originally the Page lectures at the Sheffield Scientific School in 1912, attempts, apparently, an ethical survey of various aspects of political duties and activities. Doubtless, it is legitimate, especially in the discussion of current problems, to raise questions rather than to answer them; but the way in which the thing is done, and the implications which the author's statement of the case involves, are matters of some importance. Shall a member of Congress prefer the interests of his district or State to those of the country? Shall the voter stay with his party when he does not agree with the party principles? Is the opinion of a leader more to be relied upon than the opinion of the people? The substance of Professor Emery's answer to these and many other similar queries is that these are serious and perplexing questions; that they often involve questions of conscience, that in dealing with them you have sometimes to act in one way and sometimes in another, and that, on the whole the balance of safety is on the side of party regularity. Perhaps, however, Professor Emery does not mean quite this; in which case we can only wish that he had stated his political philosophy with more precision. Incidentally, the text, which preserves the familiar form of the lecture, ought to have been revised. There are numerous inelegancies, and on pages 42 and 58 are sentences that will not parse.

"Beyond the Old Frontier," by George Bird Grinnell, is a new addition to Scribner's Adventure and Exploration series, appealing particularly to the boy reader. Mr. Grinnell has not made the mistake of writing down with malice aforethought to an arbitrarily assumed level of boyhood intelligence. The adult who has carried along enough of youth to relish stirring tales of adventure with Indians, buffalo, and other incidents of frontier life will find this a very readable volume, and after all there could be no better test of its fitness for boys. The book is made up largely of material from works now out of print, sometimes quoted directly and sometimes given merely in substance. Alexander Ross, the Scotchman who was one of the early acquisitions of John Jacob Astor in his far Western fur-trading operations and wrote a book on "The Fur Hunters of the Far West"; George Frederick Ruxton, "Adventures in Mexico and the Rocky Mountains"; Lewis H. Garrard, "Wah-To-Yah and the Taos Trail," and John Palisser, an Irishman who visited the American frontier in the late forties as a hunter and sightseer, are the authors upon whom Mr. Grinnell has chiefly drawn.

"Unruly Daughters: A Romance of the House of Orleans" (Putnam) is not a romance in the ordinary sense of the term, but an account of the doings of the six daughters of the Duc d'Orléans, Regent of France. The author, H. Noel Williams, has now to his credit a long list of books dealing with the Court of France in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. He is familiar with the memoirs and with the best recent French literature on the subject. He is accurate enough, and fair-minded enough, and knows his people well enough, and has written, in the present case, in a clear and sprightly, if somewhat mechanical, style, a book which will doubtless prove entertaining to people who are interested in what Edmond de Goncourt called the "indiscretions of history." Mr. Williams himself seems inclined to write about people with tarnished reputations, such as Pompadour, Du Barry, and the irresistible Duc de Richelieu. People of that sort, however, may be important as well as notorious; and some of Mr. Williams's books were well worth the doing. The main objection to the present undertaking is that the Regent's daughters scarcely merit so much attention; and of the six, those who receive most attention from the author deserve it least—the unspeakable Duchesse de Berry and Mlle. de Valois. Still, familiarity with the Court of the Regent has this advantage: it makes the Court of Louis XV appear almost decent, and that of Louis XVI actually puritanical!

"Before old age should make my hand falter, and the scenes and the faces of the past become indistinct in my memory, I desired to fix an image that is always with me," says M. Augustin Filon, the aged and devoted author of an excellent biography of Napoleon III's unfortunate son, "The Prince Imperial, 1856-1879" (Little, Brown). In 1867, when the shadows were still distant on the horizon, M. Filon was called from the Lycée at Grenoble to become tutor to the Prince Imperial. In July, 1870, the fourteen-year-old Prince started for the front with the Emperor, received his "baptism of fire," and in a boyish letter to his tutor described the French success at Sarrebrück. But this success was swiftly followed by the crushing Prussian blows and the mouse-trap at Sedan. M. Filon, who had remained at Paris with the Empress, telegraphed to the aides in charge of the Prince to make for Belgium, though not in the punning brevity which Republican enemies have merrily alleged: "Filons sur Belge.—Filon." From Belgium the Prince crossed to England and joined his parents at Chislehurst. He was allowed to enter with English boys at Woolwich Academy, where he diligently studied the military engineers' course, and then passed on with the regular English officers to Aldershot. In 1879, after forty-eight hours of mental struggle, he made up his mind to ask to be permitted to join the English force which was to operate against the Zulus. His mother and the leaders of the Bonapartist party did their best to dissuade him, but he replied in words (slightly condensed) which sound like an echo of his great-uncle:

> All hopes are centred in my person; if that becomes great, the strength of the Imperial party becomes ten-fold. No one will be followed but a man of known energy, and my care has been to find a way of making myself known. Writing letters of condolence, harboring politicians, patting journalists on the back, hob-nobbing with them, and working with them to stir up social problems—that is what the headstrong call "making myself conspicuous." Others want me to travel through Europe with a great retinue. I have turned a deaf ear. When one belongs to a race of soldiers, it is only with the sword in hand that one gains recognition, and he who wants to learn by travel must go far. The disaster at Isandhlwana gives me the opportunity I want.

The sequel is known. The Prince went with a party of half a dozen horsemen to look for a camping place near the Zulus. While the party was off its guard, preparing supper, it was suddenly attacked by Zulus, who had crawled up stealthily in the long grass. Most of the party managed to mount their horses and escape; but the Prince could not swing himself into the saddle of his frightened beast. He tried to defend himself with his revolver, but could not hold out against the overwhelming force of black spearmen. The spot where he fell, to which his mother made a pilgrimage the next year, is now marked by a simple cairn. M. Filon's devoted story of this boy's life is very human, with its good photographs of the Prince's playmates, rooms, handwriting, and father and mother. It is also an authoritative biography, for in addition to his own intimate personal knowledge, the author was allowed by the Empress the unrestricted use of all her son's correspondence.

In "Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha of the Old Testament" (Oxford University Press) we have for the first time a substantially complete collection, in English translation, of the non-canonical Jewish writings of the period extending from 200 B. C. to 100 A. D. The work is in two handsomely printed volumes, the first giving the Apocrypha, the second the Pseudepigrapha; the general editor is R. H. Charles, of Oxford, well known as a scholarly student of this branch of Jewish literature. The first volume contains all the books commonly regarded as apocryphal (those, namely, given in the Septuagint and the Latin Vulgate, but not in the Hebrew Bible) except Second Esdras (Fourth Ezra), which, as claiming a false authorship, is put in the second volume; on the other hand, Third Maccabees, contrary to the usual custom, is inserted here. In the second volume are given Jubilees, the Letter of Aristeas, the Books of Adam and Eve, the Martyrdom of Isaiah, First Enoch, the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, the Sibylline Oracles, the Assumption of Moses, Second Enoch (the Secrets of Enoch), Second Baruch (the Syriac Apocalypse), Third Baruch (Greek Apocalypse), Fourth Ezra, and the Psalms of Solomon; and, further, four books (Fourth Maccabees, Pirke Aboth, the Story of Ahikar, and Fragments of a Zadokite Work), which, though not pseudepigrapha, are added as reflecting certain ideas of the time. In regard to this arrangement in the two volumes, it may be observed that the Wisdom of Solomon and the Epistle of Jeremy appear under false names, and it is not clear why they stand in the first volume, while Fourth Ezra is removed to the second. The few Apocryphal books omitted are of little or no importance for the religious history of the time.

It is not possible to take note here of the numerous and difficult critical and exegetical questions that arise in connection with the books included in the collection. It must suffice to say that the material is brought up to the date of publication (L. W. Batten's excellent volume on Ezra and Nehemiah, in the "International Critical Commentary," in which First Esdras is discussed, appeared after the Oxford work was issued). A general introduction to each volume is furnished by Dr. Charles, and each book is edited, with introduction and notes, by a specialist. The various views held by scholars are stated and examined, and extensive bibliographies are given. Thus the student of the non-canonical literature may gain a knowledge of the questions to be solved, even the most recent, and of the material available for their solution. He will find here also a view of the whole field, and will be able to compare book with book and critic with critic more conveniently than if he had to go to separate volumes devoted to the various books. The work will, doubtless, further the study of the Jewish thought of the period in question, a period remarkable for its religious and intellectual activity and important for the illustration of the New Testament.

MORE CHILDREN'S BOOKS.

A little book which will appeal to a child's sense of humor as well as to his ideas of the "fitness of things" is Gelett Burgess's "The Goop Directory" (Stokes), wherein all people, from Marmaduke Argyll, who would insist on talking while eating, even to Rosie L. V. Trood, famed for playing with her food, are stamped both in pictures and verses for their coarse habits. As the author declares:

> In this Directory you'll see
> Just what you never ought to be.

The illustrations are in accordance with the Goop curvatures, made famous in other volumes.

Three once-upon-a-time stories by Eva March Tappan have been gathered together in a volume bearing the title "The House with the Silver Door" (Houghton). Silvery Girl and Silver Boy figure as characters in the first narrative. There are occasional drawings by Emily Hall Chamberlain.

A brightly covered volume is "The Rose Fairy Book" (Doran), edited by Mrs. Herbert Strang. Some of Perrault's tales have been retranslated, while Cinderella, Ali Baba, and Aladdin have been rewritten—shades of our honored classics! Even Red Riding Hood is grabbed from the jaws of death! The text is handsomely printed, and the pictures are plentiful.

A story by Annie Fellows Johnston, called "Miss Santa Claus of the Pullman" (Century), is a mild narrative which seeks to reform young Will'm's idea of stepmothers. At times the story borders on the sentimental, but it is a book well suited to youngsters five and six years of age.

Some years ago Dr. Headland gave us a "Chinese Mother Goose"; this year we meet with Mary Fenollosa's "Blossoms from a Japanese Garden" (Stokes), a unique bouquet of child-verses. The illustrations in color are by Japanese artists, delicately tinted and quaint in their interpretative spirit.

Juvenile dramatics are now a formidable part of every boy's and every girl's education. Mrs. Emma Sheridan Fry has considered the subject in a handy brochure which she calls "Educational Dramatics" (Moffat, Yard). The manual is intended for teachers, club leaders, and amateur players. Stella G. S. Perry's "When Mother Lets Us Act" (Moffat, Yard) offers practical suggestions for actual performances. If you would know how to make costumes and scenery, how to play statues, tableaux, pantomimes, and charades, this small book will give adequate explanation. "Plays for the Home" (Houghton Mifflin) consists of dramatizations, by Augusta Stevenson, of some of Æsop's Fables and the fairy tales of Grimm and Andersen—which reminds us that "Snow White," the children's play given so charmingly at Winthrop Ames's Little Theatre, has been issued in book form by Dodd, Mead. There is a great field open to those who write small plays for children; such dialogues have to be kept as simple as possible.

Martha Foote Crow has told the life of "Harriet Beecher Stowe" for the distinctive biographies which Appletons issue yearly for young readers. The author, who first saw Mrs. Stowe, an old lady, seated in chapel at Wellesley College, has handled her material reverently.

It is to be deplored that Miss Porter's "The Scottish Chiefs" and Miss Aguilar's "The Days of Bruce" are not more generally read. Old-fashioned in a sentimental way, yet they contain the action of a wonderfully exciting time in history. It may be that R. L. Mackie's "Story of Robert the Bruce," which has been imported by the Crowells, will serve to revive an interest in these two books. These publishers are to be commended for the biographical series of which this record of Bruce is one.

We can well imagine the delight with which the expectant youngster will receive Chelsea Curtis Fraser's "Every Boy's Book of Handicraft, Sports, and Amusements" (Dana Estes), wherein every conceivable activity of youth is prescribed for: woodworking and electricity, printing and collecting, camping and gardening, to mention only a few. There are seven hundred pages of fun here.

"The Handy Boy" (Lothrop, Lee) is Miss Neely Hall's contribution, actuated by the motto that to "do something" means to "be something." If the boy has no proper tools, this author suggests a practical way of earning the money to spend for them.

"Harper's Beginning Electricity," by Don. Cameron Shafer, is another simplified manual of instruction. After a boy has sufficiently weighed its contents, there is no reason why he should not be able to untangle the most complicated electrical knot, and place electrical surprises all over his house—if he is permitted.

To many the best of all fairy books is "The Fairy Book," by the author of "John Halifax, Gentleman." We are glad to see that Macmillans have brought out this collection in a handsome edition. It appears in a cloth gilt cover, on which is embossed the legend of the little men who stole down and disappeared when the cock had crowed for the third time. The illustrations in color, by Walter Goble, are as pretty and dainty things of the kind as we have ever seen.

Brief accounts of the birds and animals which children are wont to coddle are furnished by Florence E. Dugdale in "The Book of Pets" (Doran). The creatures' habits and haunts are fully explained, with no great charm of style, together with the sort of care which they should receive. E. J. Detmold's drawings in color are not always true to perspective.

Science

The world's cotton crop and manufacture is the subject of the leading article, by Prof. A. Woeikof, of St. Petersburg, in the Annales de Géographie for November. He believes the great cotton fields in the future will be in the Russian empire, the eastern Sudan, and the middle Niger region. The results of four years' study of the tsetse fly problem in the French colonies in western Africa is given by M. E. Roubaud, chief of the laboratory of the Pasteur Institute. In his opinion the fly will fundamentally change the conditions of life in tropical Africa and be a serious obstacle to the civilization of the natives. There is also a detailed account of the ninth inter-university geographical excursion by its leader, besides an urgent recommendation to make Rabat the capital of that part of Morocco under French protection.

The latest of the numerous atlases which are appearing these days has been prepared by Mr. Fawcett Allen, assistant map-curator to the Royal Geographical Society, entitled "An Atlas of Commercial Geography" (Cambridge University Press; Putnam). For work below that of collegiate grade, the volume is one of more than ordinary excellence; it is intended to serve primarily as a companion volume to the same publishers' "Elementary Commercial Geography." Nevertheless, this atlas presents the fundamental principles of economic geography in such compact and workable form that it is adapted to still wider use. Though smaller in bulk and scope, Mr. Allen's work bears a resemblance to the excellent older "Handels-Atlas zur Verkehrs- und Wirtschaftsgeographie" of Scobel, and in one particular is superior, in that it contains a voluminous index. The maps are arranged in two main divisions, of which the first contains such general maps as are necessary to lay the foundation for teaching the principles of economic geography. Here are portrayed the main features of topography, ocean depths, the distribution of rainfall, ocean currents, drainage basins, and other similar factors in man's physical environment. These are followed by a series of maps illustrating the distribution of man himself, the situation of the principal languages of commerce, and the regions of supply of the world's leading raw products. The second main division of the book contains a number of plates of each of the continents, arranged in a consistent series, and exhibiting their subject-matter in sufficient detail to serve a variety of purposes, including regional study. The coloring of the maps is good, and in general each one is well calculated to impress the main points had in mind. In some cases, however, an attempt has been made to show too many separate things on a single map. The volume contains a well-written introduction by D. A. Jones, who is the assistant librarian to the Royal Geographical Society. It is in the form of short paragraphs on the separate maps in the first main division of the book, and serves to indicate a logical method of study, by joining together facts and observations in a natural sequence.

Dr. John Green, an oculist of international fame, and since 1886 professor of ophthalmology in St. Louis Medical College, Washington University, died Sunday at his home in St. Louis. He was born in Worcester, Mass., in 1835, and graduated from Harvard in 1855, later studying medicine in Cambridge and in Europe. He was an assistant surgeon in the Civil War.

Drama

Burbage and Shakespeare's Stage. By Mrs. C. C. Stopes. London: The De La More Press (Alexander Moring). 5 shillings net.

The title of this book does not give a very exact idea of its contents. It is a history of the three Burbages—James, Richard, and Cuthbert—and of their business ventures as managers of companies and theatres (The Theatre, Globe, and Blackfriars), from the first appearance of James Burbage as a member of the Earl of Leicester's company of actors in the early years of Elizabeth's reign until the death of Cuthbert (who was himself never an actor) in 1636. Mrs. Stopes's work accordingly is not limited to the period of Shakespeare's activity. Moreover, her narrative of the years during which the great dramatist was composing plays for the Burbages' company is not written with any special reference to their connection with one another. Indeed, in the body of her work the author rarely mentions the plays that this company produced.

The materials which we possess for the lives of the Burbages consist almost wholly of official orders and legal documents pertaining to the numerous lawsuits in which they were involved as theatre-managers. Such records, of course, throw little or no light on the personal traits of the men concerned or on what distinguished them in their art—the things that really matter. Mrs. Stopes has made some additions to the materials of this kind that were already available, but none, it seems to us, of any particular importance. Under such circumstances writers are tempted to draw far-fetched inferences in order to give some color to the dim images on which they are working. We cannot but account it as an instance of yielding to this temptation when Mrs. Stopes observes in regard to the acceptance of James Burbage by the Earl of Leicester as one of his players: "His acceptance argues not only James Burbage's honesty and prudence, but his handsome appearance, charming manners, tact, and ready wit." On the other hand, there is a genuine personal interest in the letter from the Earl of Pembroke to Viscount Doncaster which she has been so fortunate as to unearth in the British Museum. It relates to the death of Richard Burbage in 1619, and, among other things, makes it clear that relations of genuine friendship could exist between an actor and a great nobleman of the time. The letter, as printed by Mrs. Stopes, runs as follows:

My Lord,—

I could not let my cousin Berkley go without this small testimony of my unceremonious respect unto your Lordship.

. . . This day the French Ambassador took leave. . . . we shall put off our blacks [i. e., mourning on account of the death of James I's consort] and be laught at for it by all Christendom at Midsummer. . . . Now you have all that I know that past since your departure but that my Lord of Lenox made a great supper to the French Embassador this night here and even now all the company are at the play, which I being tender-harted, could not endure to see so soone after the loss of my old acquaintance Burbage. . . . Your Lordship's most affectionate friend and servaunt. Pembroke.

Whitehall
20th May.

Among other new details presented in this book we may note that Mrs. Stopes fixes 1583 as the year when Richard Burbage began his career on the stage. She also gives good reasons for dating at the end of 1575 or beginning of 1576 the order of the corporation of London wholly prohibiting all plays within the city and consequently for again connecting the founding of The Theatre with the decree of expulsion. Since E. K. Chambers's discussion of the matter some years ago it has been customary to assign a later date to this order. The little in the book that relates directly to Shakespeare is conjecture pure and simple—for example, the suggestion that the poet first came to London in order to press the law-suit of his family about the Asbies property and the theory that "Midsummer Night's Dream" was written for the marriage of Sir Thomas Heneage to the mother of Shakespeare's patron, the Earl of Southampton. We do not see, either, why Mrs. Stopes should have reproduced so obvious a forgery as the elegy on Richard Burbage which Collier pretended to have discovered in some unknown manuscript.

At the end of her volume the author has assembled the documents on which her account of the Burbages is based. They occupy almost as many pages as the account itself. Those which sprang from the Burbages' law-suit with their ground landlord, Giles Alleyn, are interminable. The liberties which Mrs. Stopes has taken with the original spelling of these various documents seem to us uncalled for. A more serious ground for complaint is that hardly ever throughout the work does she indicate whether a document has appeared in print before. Most of these records have, of course, already been published by at least one of the earlier writers on the stage, such as Collier, Halliwell-Phillipps, Hazlitt, and others. References to these works would have been helpful even to professional students. Among the notes especially valuable is the list of the court performances of the Burbages' company from 1560 on, for a period of eighty years.

A. C. McClurg & Co. announce a volume containing three plays by Arthur Schnitzler in an English translation by Horace B. Samuel. The plays are entitled "The Green Cockatoo," "The Mate," and "Paracelsus."

Among forthcoming books announced by Brentano's are the following: Bernard Shaw's "Fanny's First Play," "Misalliance," and "The Dark Lady of the Sonnets," the three pieces in one volume, and a volume of "Three More Plays by Brieux," containing "La Robe Rouge," "La Foi," and "La Femme Seule."

Martha Hedman, who lately appeared with John Mason in "Indian Summer" and "The Attack," is going to London to support Sir George Alexander in the latter play.

During the last three weeks of their tenancy of the St. James's Theatre, in London, Granville Barker and Lillah McCarthy are illustrating the advantages of the repertory system by changing their programme every night.

The Birmingham Repertory Theatre has just produced a translation by Christopher Sanderman of the German dramatist Max Halbe's play, "Der Strom," rechristened "The River." The original was done some eight years ago in London by a German company, with Frau Rosa Bertens in the part of Renate, which Miss Darragh sustains in the present version.

Lewis Waller has been appearing in "Henry V" in Australia, with great success. It is a performance deserving of more appreciation, critical and popular, than it found in this city.

"The Woodlanders" has just been played in the Dorchester Corn Exchange by the Dramatic Society of that town. A special correspondent of a London newspaper writes:

"The Woodlanders," like all the preceding plays (with the single exception of "The Three Wayfarers," which was prepared for the stage by Mr. Thomas Hardy himself), was adapted from the novel by Mr. A. H. Evans. It differs from all its predecessors in that the element of rustic humor is much less conspicuous, and as the story advances it resolves itself unmistakably into tragedy, and ends on a sombre tragic note—the death of Giles Winterborne in the rain-sodden autumn woods, and the lament of the two women who loved him—Grace Melbury and Marty South—over his dead body and his undeserved fate.

"L'Occident," a new play by the Belgian dramatist, Henry Kistemaeckers, has just been produced at the Renaissance in Paris. The scenes are laid in and about the navy yard at Toulon, where a fair Arabian girl is the favorite of the captain of the Dreadnought Fraternité. Presently, she learns from a wandering tribesman that her whole tribe, including her father, her three brothers, and her younger sister, Fatma, had been killed during a bombardment near Mogador by a French warship. That warship was the Fraternité, and the captain, her lover, was its commander. Then she vows dire vengeance. The unsuspecting captain is the protector of a young lieutenant, who suddenly wishes to resign his commission and desert his duty because he is a slave to opium, a pacifist, and a collectivist; and warfare in his estimation is the greatest of crimes. The girl of the desert finds in him her opportunity for revenge. She uses all her charms to lure him to desert his duty at the very time that his ship is ordered away to face the enemy. But the captain of the Fraternité discovers the flight in time, catches up with the fugitive, and makes him listen to the voice of reason in a poignant scene at the end of the third act. Patriotism and the call of duty are stronger than love; and the child of the slaughtered Arabs returns to the desert.

RICHARD STRAUSS'S "ROSENKAVALIER."

The first and most important operatic novelty of the season had its première at the Metropolitan on Tuesday evening. Richard Strauss did not, as had been hoped, come to New York to superintend the production of his comic opera, "The Rose-Bearer," probably because resentment at the suppression of his "Salome" after a single performance still rankles in his bosom; but he kindly allowed it—doubtless for a very substantial consideration—to be staged here, after having vowed he would never again have anything to do with the Metropolitan. His presence would have added to the éclat of the occasion, but could hardly have improved the performance, which, under Alfred Hertz, and with a cast including Frieda Hempel, Frl. Ober, Anna Case, Goritz, Weil, Jörn, and Reiss, was remarkably good. For this first performance the prices for seats had been nearly doubled, yet there was a large audience, and there was much applause.

When the German newspapers, a few years ago, first began to give the world driblets of information regarding the "Rosenkavalier" much was made of the fact that it was to be entirely different from Strauss's other operas. "In place of bloodthirst, perversity, and general unhealthiness," readers were informed, there would be "melody, merriment, and simplicity"; indeed, it was hinted that Strauss, whose usual aim seemed to be to break all records in the matter of complexity of scoring, had gone back to

Mozart for his model. Naturally, all this served to arouse general curiosity, and when the opera had its first performance, on January 26, 1911, in Dresden, the audience included so many musical celebrities that, as some one remarked, "if a bomb had been exploded in the Royal Opera, the course of the history of music would have been changed."

Hugo von Hofmannsthal, who prepared the libretto for "Elektra," also wrote that of the "Rosenkavalier." This name refers to a custom in vogue in Austria two centuries ago, in compliance with which a suitor for a lady's hand sent a cavalier to bring her a silver rose. The suitor in this case is Baron Ochs von Lerchanau, an extremely coarse and vulgar personage, who, having come to the end of his pecuniary resources, has decided condescendingly to marry Sophia, the beautiful daughter of Von Faninal, a newly ennobled wealthy army contractor. In the first scene Ochs visits his cousin, the Princess Werdenberg, to ask her aid in finding a suitable rose-bearer. The Princess, whose husband is one of Maria Theresa's field marshals, carries on, while he is absent in Croatia, an intrigue with a youth named Octavian, who happens to be making love to the Princess when the Baron arrives, but hides behind a screen, whence he presently emerges in the attire of a lady's maid. The Baron at once sees a chance for an intrigue, and invites the supposed maid to a supper. Left alone, the Princess decides to select Octavian as the rose-bearer, though she foresees he will fall in love with Sophia. In the second act this actually happens. The Baron, who is present, becomes jealous and provokes the rose-bearer to a duel, in which he (the Baron) is wounded slightly. Before he leaves, a note is put in his hand from the "lady's maid," who promises to meet him at supper; and in the final act this meeting takes place. Arrangements have been made for playing all sorts of practical jokes on the Baron. Things reach such a pass that the police interfere. The Baron is completely routed, and Octavian wins Sophia's hand.

The librettist calls his poem a "comedy for music," but it is really a farce, of the broadest sort. In the original, the text of the first act is extremely coarse, and before the Imperial family allowed the opera to be performed in Berlin a sofa had to be substituted for the bed. The version used here is expurgated, and Otto Goritz, on whose shoulders the action chiefly rests, knows how to be funny without being offensive. He is the only one in the cast who sings everything intelligibly; but even he cannot greatly interest an American audience in a dialogue the fun of which lies largely in the use of the quaint Viennese dialect. Hofmannsthal has not given much more of real humor in this "comedy" than he has in his "Der Thor und der Tod" or his other plays. From the composer's point of view, his libretto is less successful than the one he provided for Strauss's "Elektra," being too crowded with details that cannot be effectively set to music. In trying to illustrate all these details musically, Strauss displayed great ingenuity but spoiled the opera, besides making it extremely difficult for the singers.

Because of these complexities one cannot find the vaunted Mozartean quality in this score. That Strauss, however, tried to be truly tuneful for once is certain; there are waltzes and other episodes that are really melodious; but, unfortunately, the melody is for the most part commonplace. Almost any musician could sit at the piano and improvise waltzes and tunes as good as these, by the hour. As in most of the other works of this composer, it is the orchestral coloring, chiefly, that enchants; but the average opera-goer is not content with that; he wants broad melodies and passionate accents, and these are not to be found in "Der Rosenkavalier," even in the love-scenes. These, in fact, are the dullest parts of the opera. There are beauty spots in each of the acts, but almost the only episodes one longs to hear again are the presenting of the rose to Sophia, where the music, with the aid of harps and celesta, becomes quasi-fragrant, and the trio at the end of the last act—a trio which the Straussites place on a level with the quintet in Wagner's "Meistersinger." It certainly is beautiful, and it shows a regard for the proper idiom of the human voice which the "Rose-Bearer" as a whole does not.

Among musical and allied publications of the season, not all of which can be reviewed in these columns before the holidays, are "Memoirs of an American Prima Donna" (Clara Louise Kellogg), published by G. P. Putnam's Sons; "Symphonies and Their Meaning" (third series), by Philip Goepp (Lippincott); Loie Fuller's "Fifteen Years of a Dancer's Life" (Small, Maynard & Co.); Thompson's "Life of Ethelbert Nevin" (Boston Music Co.); "Advice to Violin Students," by Wallace Ritchie (Scribner); Hamilton's "Outlines of Music History," revised edition (Oliver Ditson Co.); Spaeth's "Milton's Knowledge of Music" (Princeton University Library); Filson Young's "Opera Stories" (Henry Holt & Co.); Evans's translation of Wagner's "Opera and Drama" (Scribner); an excellent guide to Humperdinck's "Hänsel and Gretel," by Lewis M. Isaacs and Kurt J. Rahlston (Dodd, Mead & Co.); Vincent D'Indy's "Beethoven," translated by Theodore Baker (Boston Music Co.); a translation, by Edwin Evans, of Berlioz's admirable analyses of Beethoven's nine symphonies (Scribner); Oliver Huckel's translation of Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde" (Thomas Y. Crowell Co.); "The Growth of Music," by H. C. Colles (Oxford University Press); Landon Ronald's "Masterpieces of Tchaikovsky" (F. A. Stokes Co.); C. W. Grimm's "Harmony Study" (W. H. Willis Co.); Joseffy's extremely valuable "First Studies for the Piano" (G. Schirmer); Kobbé's "Opera Singers," profusely illustrated (Oliver Ditson Co.); "Swedish Song Games," by Kastman and Köhler (Ginn & Co.); "Old Fogy" (Theodore Pressor Co.); and Ethel Shubert's "Stories of the Operas" (Penn Publishing Co.).

It is characteristic of Saint-Saëns that at what he declared to be his final appearance as pianist and organist he played in Paris the other day pieces by Liszt and Mozart, two of his idols. He intends to spend the winter in Algiers and Egypt, enjoying nature and composing pieces for organ and piano; also, perhaps, a choral work.

WILLIAM BLAKE AT THE TATE GALLERY.

London, November 25.

The director of the Tate Gallery continues to make up for the general mediocrity of the British collection under his charge by giving special Loan Exhibitions, which are of genuine importance to artists. He has already, in the short time since the Gallery has been under his care, arranged shows of the Pre-Raphaelites, Whistler, the English Alfred Stevens, Legros; now, he has got together a fine and representative series of paintings, drawings, and prints by William Blake, which will remain on the walls until the end of December.

It can hardly be said that of late years Blake has suffered from neglect or indifference. Indeed, it is even a question whether he suffered so much in his lifetime as his recent biographers and eulogists have a way of making out—whether, in fact, his grievances, as in the case of Millet, have not been greatly overrated. Pleasure in art is not to be measured by the palatial studios the artist is able to build for himself or by the social honors lavished upon him. Blake, no less than Millet, was free to lead the life that best suited him and to do the work he wished most to do, and no man can be called unhappy, or is to be pitied, who enjoys the privilege of living and working as he chooses. True, he did pass through moments of bitter poverty, but, on the whole, he prospered as well as most engravers of his day—and he was primarily an engraver; what is more, after his first years, he was seldom reduced to mere hack work or potboiling. It may be said that this could not have been except for the help of one or two men, like his friends, Butt and Linnell, who bought his work and commissioned it. But most artists would starve if they looked to the general public for practical recognition. After his death, Blake was neglected and forgotten by all save the most forlorn saving remnant. The period was one when work such as his was bound to be neglected—the period when the majority of artists in England believed with Wilkie that to know the taste of the public is the most valuable knowledge for the artist, and, accordingly, did their best to play down to it. But the indifference came to an end with the publication of Gilchrist's Life of Blake, half a century ago, and since then, and after Swinburne had promptly opened the floodgates of his rhetoric upon Blake, almost too much has been said and written about him; he has been set on almost too high a pinnacle for all the world to see, numerous exhibitions of his work have been held, and he has been the easy prey of the English critic who, engrossed in the literary or mystical meaning of his designs, can comfortably ignore that there is in them also a question of art.

This is the difficulty with the posthumous popularity thrust upon Blake: Blake the artist has been sacrificed to Blake the mystic. He may have seen visions, and it may have been the visions he desired above all to paint or draw or engrave. But how many artists could tell you that they, too, see visions, different as their inspiration may be from his—that they, too, with their fancy, imagination, mind's eye, or whatever it may be called, see before them their painting, or drawing, or print, complete before ever they put the first touch on canvas, or paper, or metal. That Blake's visions were not in the least the same as those of most artists, that his preoccupation with them was greater, cannot affect the quality of his art one way or the other. To him might have been revealed still more extraordinary things, his preoccupation with them might have been still more intense, and had he not had the technical ability to express himself, the revelations would not be worth the canvas or paper or metal on which he recorded them.

A comprehensive exhibition like the present one at the Tate is therefore useful from time to time as a reminder that Blake was not merely a visionary, but an artist with a great deal of tecnical ability—of amazing technical ability, when it comes to his prints. There are here numerous examples of his illustrations, culminating in the series for the Book of Job; in some cases several states shown side by side, the original reduced drawings done for Linnell included—a series that proves beyond a doubt what a master he was of design, how splendid was his power of composition. No matter what the subject, his beautiful interpretation of the text, "When the morning stars sang together, and all the Sons of God shouted for joy," in which the rhythmical lines and curves sing of themselves, would be one of the most memorable prints in the world. There are numerous examples of the paintings which he called frescoes, and for which the catalogue uses the term tempera, and they prove as indisputably what a master he was of color. The most famous are shown: The Canterbury Pilgrims, The Spiritual Form of Pitt Guiding Behemoth, The Spiritual Form of Nelson Guiding Leviathan, Adam Naming the Beasts, all crammed full of meaning and symbol and allegory, and too familiar to be described anew. With them are smaller less well-known subjects, The Temptation of Eve, Bathsheba at the Bath, Our Lady and Child, The Procession from Calvary, and many besides, all together giving something of the same emotion that is felt before the Venetian masterpieces. Not that I would rank Blake with the great Venetians—he was not one of the giants—but he had a fine sense of harmony that in any other country, or at any other period, might almost have made him their rival as a colorist. There are also examples of his color prints, his printed drawings, for which he invented or perfected his own method, one requiring a precision that probably no other engraver of his day could have attained. To have invented or perfected a method adapted to one's own needs, to practice it, to excel in it—there is a pleasure that pays the artist more substantial coin than mere dollars and cents.

Space has been found for the work of some of Blake's contemporaries, friends, and followers—Fuseli, Stothard, Flaxman, Linnell, Palmer, Calvert, George Richmond, almost all of whom were considerably influenced by him, and who seem at times to have endeavored conscientiously not only to see visions, but to see his special kind of visions. Only a few examples of each of these men have been selected for the purpose, and, when thus shown with the Blakes, it must be confessed they leave the impression that they were ambitious artists, but that their achievements did not keep pace with their intentions. Here and there is a little masterpiece, like Stothard's Tam O'Shanter, that has a splendor and loveliness of color worthy of Blake. But as a rule this smaller series is overshadowed by the larger, though it is of sufficient interest to suggest that this group of artists, seldom seen and half-forgotten, might provide the director of the Tate with his next Loan Exhibition.

A full and eleborate catalogue has been prepared by Mr. Archibald G. B. Russell, that should have its value for collectors. But a serious drawback to the pleasure and comfort of the student is the failure of the numbers of the works on the walls to follow in consecutive order the numbers of the books in the catalogue. This is a mistake so seldom made in English exhibitions that it is all the more seriously felt.

The Reminiscences of Augustus Saint-Gaudens. Edited and amplified by Homer Saint-Gaudens. New York: The Century Co. Two volumes. Illustrated. $7 net.

In his later invalid years Saint-Gaudens dictated his autobiography. It is of a vivacity and inaccuracy worthy of his Gascon-Irish origins, and his son and biographer has had an uncommonly difficult task in building a two-volume memoir of such materials. But by cutting the autobiography into chapters, adding explanatory and corrective interchapters, and interweaving letters, the feat has been accomplished with considerable success. One gets, if hardly a satisfactory account of a notable artistic career, at least the sense of a brilliant and lovable personality.

Saint-Gaudens was a foreordained artist. Trained in the hard school of stone cameo cutting, he supported himself by that trade through early years of poverty in Europe. Like almost all his American predecessors, he found the way to Rome, and his marble Hiawatha done in 1871, his twenty-third year, is remarkably like the neo-classic work of Harriet Hosmer and Crawford. What turned him from this outworn mode to the delicate and strenuous modelling of the Early Renaissance masters, one would like to know. Here this book is disappointing. Saint-Gaudens made it a point of coquetry not to write shop, and we may merely guess how he came to follow the road of Fremiet and Mercié. In any case, he became the chief exemplar in America of that refined craftsmanship in which the Early Florentines excelled, and in such disciples as Macmonnies, Adams, McNeil, and Fraser made it almost the distinctive American note in sculpture. His most personal qualities are shown in the remarkable portraits in low relief of which the Stevenson is best known. After fifteen years of hardships cheerfully endured, he did the Farragut, 1881, and his position as the leading American sculptor was assured. It seems to us on the whole his best work of a monumental sort, having a simplicity, directness, and virility that were often refined away in the great works of his later time. There never was a more scrupulous craftsman. The inscription for the Stevenson portrait in St. Giles's, Edinburgh, was fully modelled twelve times. There are no less than twenty-seven position sketches for the Peter Cooper.

The scorn of the commonplace or overemphatic is the characteristic note of the artist. A somewhat scornful comment on Rodin's Balzac is one of the few artistic opinions recorded of Saint-

Gaudens. It looked too much "like a guttering candle." In his complete lucidity Saint-Gaudens was true to his Gallic heredity. The breadth of pathos which informs the splendid Shaw Memorial and the repressed prophetic fire of the Sherman he may well have drawn from his admirable Irish mother.

On several occasions Saint-Gaudens complains humorously that Stanford White is trying to make a man-about-town of him, and, curiously enough, this memoir gives some sense of a self-protecting brilliancy and geniality, as if he kept the artist exclusively for the fevered solitude of the studio. No great artist who has written about himself has left so few opinions on matters artistic. It is as if Saint-Gaudens insisted on being judged solely by his work. Apparently it was enough for him to draw about himself the choicest spirits of his time, and by them to be judged simply as the delightful companion. This programme of privacy, which may well have enriched his life, has naturally somewhat impoverished his memoirs.

As to the value of his work, aside from the mysterious figure of the Rock Creek Cemetery and the Farragut, it seems to lie in exquisite craftsmanship and charm. He is crisp and full of rather subtle implication; monumental breadth he rarely tried for or achieved. In that reaction towards fine craftsmanship which followed the first naïve strivings of American art, he played an important, perhaps the most important, part. This religious devotion to technical perfection implies a degree of self-consciousness which the very greatest masters either never have or live down. Yet precisely this gospel of strenuous craftsmanship was what American art very much needed at the moment. Occasionally, as in the Shaw memorial and the two Lincolns, and earlier in the Farragut, Saint-Gaudens attained simplicity and gravity. Generally, his work reveals a captivating preciosity discreetly minimized and evident only to a very sensitive observer. Indeed, his career has interesting analogies with that of his older contemporary, Whistler, barring, of course, Whistler's waspishness. In both men are found the same fastidious taste, the same astute eclecticism, a similar positive charm, and kindred flashes of higher seriousness. In spite of the excellent studies of Messrs. Cortissoz, Cox, and Hind, the artistic personality of Saint-Gaudens remains to be elucidated. Naturally, this memoir, being a personal memorial, makes no such attempt. It is interesting throughout, and will doubtless be satisfactory to those unplagued by the critic's curiosity as to the way of the genius qua artist.

At the annual meeting of the Egypt Exploration Fund, recently held in the rooms of the Royal Society, Burlington House, London, it was announced that arrangements have been made to complete this winter the excavation of the Osireion of Abydos. Results of the greatest importance for Egyptian archæology and for the history of Egyptian religion are expected from the enterprise. Prof. Edouard Naville, on whose advice the excavation was originally undertaken, will again take charge of the work.

An interesting archæological discovery has been made in Rome, near the Baths of Caracalla, by Professor Ferri. He found a large subterranean gallery, above half a mile long, as well as drains for carrying away the water from the Baths. In one of these drains he came across fragments of a marble group representing Mithras killing the sacred bull. The Baths of Caracalla were already known to have been connected with the worship of Mithras, and this discovery further bears out this theory.

In the excavations conducted on the Palatine by Prof. Giacomo Boni some important discoveries have again been made. Traces of two Imperial palaces, those of Caligula and of Nero, have been brought to light. A number of houses belonging to the Republican period have been found—two under the vestibule of the palace of Domitian, three under the Basilica, one under the Treasury, and one under the Triclinium. Further, there have been unearthed traces of the Imperial nympheum, as well as numerous constructions dating from the age of Domitian.

Marcel Dieulafoy's "Art in Spain and Portugal" (Scribner) is a rather curious apparition in the useful Ars Una series. Generally we find compilations of accepted results. A considerable part of this work is both original and somewhat controversial. M. Dieulafoy contends that all the significant features of early Spanish architecture may be explained as adaptation of Iranian modes of building imported by the Moors. He insists further that in architecture Spain, through Catalonia, contributed nearly as much to France as she received. We have no space to signalize the interesting anticipations of Gothic construction which M. Dieulafoy notes both in Spain and earlier in Persia. The rather lengthy presentation of such debatable matters, while most interesting for the special student, is a little hard on the layman for whom the series is intended. He, however, may skip contentious matters, and still find with profusion of small cuts plenty of highly condensed information. Unusual and deserved prominence is given to the minor arts. M. Dieulafoy emphasizes the unbroken tradition of polychrome sculpture in the peninsula, and generally stresses the national accent in those branches, like painting, in which foreign influence is most discernible. He writes from abundant knowledge and with unflagging enthusiasm. We fancy that few impartial critics will share his unqualified admiration for plateresque architectural ornament. Yet possibly no one who has his doubts about plateresque has any business to write on things Spanish. The publishers of this international series are to be congratulated once more on procuring a handbook which, without serious waiver of its informational function, has strong personal flavor.

The National Arts Club offers a prize of $1,000 for the best literary production embodying "A Critical Estimate of the Altman Collection," which shall be submitted by one of its members before March 1, 1914. The manuscripts will be submitted anonymously and the jury of award will be announced later.

"Painting in East and West" (Longmans), by Robert Douglas Norton, treats the whole contrast of Eastern and Western art in a very general way. Eastern art stops at suggestion and requires a definite effort of appreciation. Western art tends to imitation and requires only recognition. The defect of the Western theory of imitation Mr. Norton finds in a principle of limits. Once imitation is attained, nothing but repetition remains for later artists. For example, Chardin, Manet, and Cézanne may be said to have spoiled still life for their successors. The advantage of the Eastern theory of art as interpretation or suggestion of the rhythm of the universe is that such interpretation may be various. Moreover, such a programme implies the closest understanding between artist, philosopher, amateur, and critic. In comparison the Western artist is singularly isolated and unrepresentative. His art becomes a trick of mimicry "destined for untrained eyes; eyes slow to recognize aught but the obvious and the proximate." What Western art lacks is worthy aims and a real public. Mr. Norton sees the remedy in an education in beauty such as Plato shadowed forth in the "Republic." The race must be made anew æsthetically in the schools. Throughout the spirit of the book is winning, the style excellent, and the argument happily illustrated from both Eastern and Western literature. As to the rather lamentable lack of creative imagination in most modern art, we fully agree with the author. Yet it is fair to note that the condition is a universal one. Except in an inherited dexterity the living art of the East has to-day no advantage over that of the West. Spiritually they are alike deficient, and deficient for the same reason that there is no authoritative body of living thought. Moreover, the charm of the great examples of historic Eastern art is not necessarily to be interpreted as superiority. Chinese landscape is uniquely excellent, but in religious art we feel the great Buddhist painters had small advantage over a Simone Memmi or an Ambrogio Lorenzetti. Indeed, a comparison of the best with the best all along the line will bring a stronger sense of kinship than of difference. That modern Western art is suffering from raw individualism and general lack of ideas is patent. Such books as Mr. Norton's grave and thoughtful study help to make the situation clear. Familiarity with the well-balanced idealism of the Chinese painters and critics might well be the beginning of æsthetic wisdom for many a bewildered Western artist. Similarly a Far Eastern artist might find profit in studying the great examples of older European art. There is room for many such mediatory books at the present.

Among the disciples of Blake the most remarkable were Samuel Palmer and Edward Calvert. To Calvert's scant work Mr. Mosher, of Portland, Me., devotes a beautifully printed folio in an edition limited to 400 copies. "Edward Calvert, Ten Spiritual Designs enlarged from Proofs of the Originals in Copper, Wood, and Stone," is the sufficient descriptive title. Mr. Mosher contributes a brief introductory note telling of the precious scrap-book from which the prints have been reproduced. He puts under requisition Mr. Herbert P. Horne's excellent essay from the Hobby Horse, and relevant passages from the Memoirs of Calvert by his son. Our chief quarrel with an attractive work is the fact that the tiny designs have been enlarged to double scale. They suffer under a treatment for which no motive is apparent, except that of making a more expensive book. The cuts are well known to the inner circle of art lovers, but deserve wider divulgation. Calvert had a charming idyllic imagination, and quite extraordinary decorative power. The blacks, whether in etching, wood block, or lithograph, have great depth and splendid disposition. He excels in this regard the numerous archaistic illustrators who have served the Kelmscott and the Vale Presses.

Sincere belief in one's own genius is in itself sufficient to carry conviction to a certain audience, and in Miss Elsie de Wolfe's "The House in Good Taste" (Century) we have evidence that the author has gained a considerable following among influential people who have come to believe her to be endowed with a special artistic gift. The reality of the gift is not so certain.

Franklin Simmons, the American sculptor, died suddenly in Rome, Italy, on Monday. He was born at Webster, Me., in 1839. He was educated at the public school in Webster and at Bates College. He began modelling in the coarse clay from the Androscoggin River banks in Maine, and his first attempt in sculpture was a statue called "The Sailor Boy." Since 1868 he had lived mostly in Rome. He produced about one hundred portrait busts in marble, fifteen public monuments, among them being a Grand Army of the Republic monument of Gen. Grant and an equestrian monument of Gen. Logan for the Iowa Circle, at Washington, and numerous ideal statues. He was decorated three times by the King of Italy.

Finance

NEW IMPRESSIONS.

When the Stock Exchange, during the past week or so, suddenly displayed renewed activity, with an advance of 3 to 5 points in prices, there were reasons why the movement attracted unusual attention. The advance began and continued in the face of a deficit in New York bank reserves, with money rates on the Stock Exchange up to 8 per cent., and with news of trade reaction and reduced employment of labor reported from many sections of the country. A rising stock market, therefore, seemed on its face to mean either that all the above-named unfavorable influences had been expected and were fully prepared for, or else that the watch-towers of finance had discerned on the horizon signs of a turn to better things.

This was more fairly to be inferred, because a rise in Stock Exchange prices is usually dependent on the facilities for credit which Wall Street at the moment appears conspicuously to lack. It is no new phenomenon, to be sure, for the market to advance in the face of depleted home reserves and high call money rates. But on most occasions of the sort, the achievement was made possible because our markets drew on London, which was bound to meet our needs for increased credits and for new gold reserves, both because of our merchandise export balance and because of our robust bid for money.

This year our country has the export balance—all things considered, it is exceptionally great—and our market has made the bid for money. But the London reservoir of gold and credit has been all but shut to us—not, by any means, as in such years as 1905 and 1909, because we had already exceeded our rightful line of borrowings, but because Lombard Street cannot spare the cash. Instead of Europe carrying Wall Street on its back, as happened on those earlier occasions, New York has this year most unmistakably been carrying hard-pressed Europe.

This being so, and credit resources for the use of the Stock Exchange being to so great an extent blockaded both at home and abroad, it was a natural comment that the stock market's advance, these past eight days, may have meant more than a rise in an ordinary season would have done. When markets make a showing of the kind, Wall Street must have some definite explanation, and this week it discovered one which contented it. At Washington, the financial interests long ago found themselves fallen on evil days. The legislator who desired to "draw" the public had only to denounce the Interests from the floor of Congress. The legislator who pleaded for cautious action on a "regulation bill" was at once suspected of accepting retainers from the Money Trust. Corporation officers, if they appeared in a House committee-room to advocate a pending measure, were apt to find that they had sealed its fate. Other organizations—even of what in bygone days was known as the frailer sex—may pound on the White House door and demand in threatening tones that the Chief Executive shall recommend their case in his official address to Congress; incorporated wealth would not venture even to ask that its own case might be left out.

Necessarily, under such circumstances, the financial community—ranging from the Small Investor to the Malefactor of Great Wealth—faced the opening proceedings at each successive session of Congress with a sinking heart, asking despondently what fresh discipline they were to undergo. The President who hammered the pulpit was accepted as the prosecutor; the President who laid down the law was accepted as the judge, and the corporation always felt itself to be in the prisoner's dock. At last the time arrived when the wretched and possibly repentant corporation looked for a President who should be the headsman; when, to its undisguised surprise, it had nothing handed to it, in the annual message of December 2, but an intimation that the Anti-Trust law should be clarified and "made fairer to all concerned"; that business men "should be relieved from all uncertainties," and that it is quite as important "that they should be set free to prosper as that private monopoly should be destroyed."

Such assurances may of themselves mean much or little; that depends on the plan to be proposed, and on the manner in which Congress will receive it. This very week, there have been rumblings at the Capitol from the statesmen who hold that all the world is wrong, and that it should be reformed overnight. But a somewhat striking tendency on their part to rumble by themselves, and without the enthusiastic echo which used to follow their most violent proposals, is not easy to ignore.

Nothing at all is heard, from the high authorities in politics, of hanging financial magnates as high as Haman because there has been reaction in the markets. Instead, the word appears to have been cautiously given out that a time of trade reaction is not a time to unsettle the business mind by new and startling moves in "regulation." When the protagonist of the Money Trust inquiry declares himself "in favor of a general amnesty" in the matter of past corporation offences, there should seem to be something in the atmosphere, at Washington and elsewhere, to suggest at least a temporary suspension of the national sport of corporation-baiting.

That is a matter of the future—which will as usual contain disappointments as well as reassurances. But the Wall Street which watches tendencies may have expressed its sentiments this past week, even in the stock market's more or less ineffective pull at the cords which bind it.

FOR THE LOVER OF INFORMAL TRAVEL

ALPS AND SANCTUARIES
Piedmont and the Canton Ticino
By SAMUEL BUTLER

By SAMUEL BUTLER, whose genius for human companionship readers of his "Notebooks" well know. London critics are saying that the only book approaching it in distinction, wisdom, and humor is perhaps Thoreau's "Week on the Concord." But Thoreau and Butler are as different as Piedmont and Concord. Illus. with 85 drawings, chiefly by the author. $2.00 net.

FOR THOSE INTERESTED IN THE PERSONALITIES OF HISTORY

CHRISTINA OF DENMARK
Duchess of Milan and Lorraine
By JULIA CARTWRIGHT (Mrs. Ady)

The woman whom Henry the Eighth swore to have for wife but failed to gain had a life so singularly eventful and romantic that it is surprising that it should have been left unwritten until now. Mrs. Ady's researches into the Sixteenth Century history of "Beatrice D'Este," "Isabella D'Este," etc., revealed that this niece of Charles V was in close touch with so many events of her time in more than one country that this interesting volume naturally followed. It is of great value to every student of Italian history.
Illustrated from portraits, etc. Cloth, 8vo, $6.00 net.

FOR THE LOVER OF ROD AND LINE

A Book of Fishing Stories
By F. G. AFLALO and Others

Never before has so distinguished a gathering of enthusiasts been induced to match their best stories of exciting angling with good luck or bad. Among the contributors are the Rt. Hon. Sydney Buxton, Sir Edward Grey, Sir Herbert Maxwell, Sir Henry Seton-Karr, Lady Evelyn Cotterell, H. T. Sheringham, Lord Desborough, Dr. C. F. Holder, etc.

The superbly illustrated quarto makes an ideal presentation book for the ardent fisherman. Illus. Quarto, decorated covers, gilt. $10.00 net.

OTHER NEW BOOKS, FINELY ILLUSTRATED

Old World Love Stories

Translated by EUGENE MASON from the lays of Marie de France, and other Mediæval Romances and Legends. Illustrated and decorated by R. L. Knowles, in harmony with their subtle old-world charm.
In a decorated box, demy 8vo, $3.00 net.

The Story of My Heart By RICHARD JEFFRIES

With illustrations in color reproduced from paintings of the landscapes Jeffries loved with such intensity of feeling. 8vo, boxed, $2.50 net.

The Gathering of Brother Hilarius By MICHAEL FAIRLESS

Author of "The Roadmender," etc. Illustrated in color. 8vo, boxed, $2.50 net.

Fifty Caricatures By MAX BEERBOHM

Not even DuMaurier equals "Max" in the range of the subjects of his satiric art, as here exhibited with rare humor and originality. 8vo, $2.00 net.

BOOKS FOR THE YOUNG ILLUSTRATED IN COLORS

The Bible Story and Its Teaching for Children
By the BARONESS FREDA DE KNOOP 8vo, cloth, decorated cover, $2.50.
With forty plates in colors, reproduced from famous paintings.

The Book of the Sagas By ALICE S. HOFFMAN

Author of "The Children's Shakespeare," etc. With full-page illustrations in color, and many drawings in line by Gordon Browne. Cloth, 8vo, $2.50.

Winthrop's fascinating romance of travel remains our most vital picture of conditions in Washington and Oregon during the territorial period, sixty years ago. The value of his book, for all who are interested in Western history and adventure, has been doubled by the addition of his letters and diaries, which cover his entire stay on the Pacific Coast, beginning at San Francisco early in 1853, and closing with his overland trip East, via Salt Lake City in October.

The Nation

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, DECEMBER 18, 1913.

The Week

The condition upon which Mr. Roosevelt will accept the regular Republican nomination for President in 1916, as stated by his campaign secretary of 1912, is simplicity itself. All that the party of total depravity need do is to "purge" itself. Purge, says Mr. Martin, is the Colonel's own word. This is not the Herculean labor that one might think. Let the Colonel be named, and, ipso facto, the party is purged, black is white, the party of piracy is the party of social justice. We should not be surprised if this view of the matter had already occurred to the agile standard-bearer of the Progressives. Nor would acceptance of the nomination be desertion of the Progressives. The country has not so soon forgotten the inspiring scene when settlement workers joined with bosslets in the strains of "Everywhere he leads me I will follow on." How can you desert a party that proposes to cling to your coat-tails?

The fact that in a number of directions business activity has recently slackened makes all the more remarkable the almost complete absence of alarmist talk concerning the operation of the new tariff. The general judgment of business men is to the effect that the tariff has played little if any part in bringing about the conditions in question, and that the return of full activity is to be expected in the ordinary course of things, with the tariff just as it is. This feeling is not based on an examination of the figures of foreign commerce, but on an appreciation of factors affecting business which have no relation to the tariff; and, indeed, the figures for the brief period since the new tariff law went into effect cannot furnish any solid basis for inference. Such as they are, however, they offer no temptation for exploitation by any who might feel inclined to use them to point an alarmist moral. As Secretary Redfield says, in commenting on them, "the flooding of our markets with the alleged cheap wares of Europe has not happened." Imports for October, the first month under the new law, were far less in quantity than in the same month of last year, while it happens that exports greatly increased. Incidentally, it is worth while to mention that, according to the doctrine that passed current in high-tariff circles during a period of a dozen years and more after the panic of 1893, business gets knocked in the head by a reduction of the tariff long before the law is passed; and perhaps the failure of the thing to show any signs of going off on time this year may account for the sobriety of the protectionists in the present circumstances.

This is most gratifying news that comes from Washington in relation to the Administration's policy as to segregation. Just how much has been done towards restoring the situation as it existed before the unfortunate move was made which introduced an offensive distinction between negroes and whites where none had existed is not yet quite clear; but it seems plain that the word has gone forth that the segregationists must take the back track. In one important office, it is stated, the separation of the races has come to an end already, and it appears that a return to former conditions is under way all along the line. We trust that all this will soon take the shape of an accomplished fact; and we do not hesitate to say that in performing this act of justice and humanity, President Wilson will not only have the approval of his own conscience, but will distinctly and notably strengthen himself with the people of the whole country. The courage and right-mindedness which would be shown in a complete wiping out of his error would more than redeem the original fault.

Penny wise and pound foolish is the policy of road-building in most parts of this country. Its folly is now much more apparent than formerly, owing to the coming of the automobile. Indianapolis, for example, is waking up to the fact that it has been spending thousands of dollars on maintenance of roads which are always fast approaching dissolution. Yet the county in which is situated Detroit, the home of the automobile industry, manages to keep its main roads in repair at a cost of from ten to twenty-five dollars a mile a year. This is to be placed in contrast with the sum of $900, $1,000, and $1,200 a mile expended in New Jersey, New York, and Massachusetts. The explanation is stated to be that the Wayne County (Detroit) Commissioners have the wisdom and the courage to put $15,000 into every mile of new road, building it of concrete, and thereby virtually wiping out maintenance cost. Even Detroit can hardly have the traffic of some other portions of the country, but its course in road-building could be followed with profit in many places. One important element in it is the continual study of the roads built, with the result of great improvements in the concrete structure.

In explaining South Carolina's indifference to woman suffrage, the Columbia State makes a striking confession regarding the misuse of manhood suffrage in that commonwealth. The State has about 330,000 men of voting age. But "the central and principal policy of our politics is the exclusion of 165,000 of these possible voters from the polls because they are negroes." Worse remains behind, however, in the use the white voters themselves make of the franchise. "Everybody knows," the State declares, "that in recent years we have failed to conduct a white man's primary free from fraud and corruption. . . . We lack either the intelligence or the courage to prosecute bribe-takers and bribe-givers. Our corrupt-practice laws are honored in the breach. We have so far neglected to arrange a party enrolment that is even a reasonable check on illegal voting and repeating." The discouraging element in the situation is that the primaries were once conducted honestly; their debauching is a recent development. If there be "treason" in the State's frankness, it is the kind of treason that it behooves honest voters to make the most of.

Advocates of the army canteen who have asserted that nothing but the sale of beer and light wines in army posts would reduce drinking in the service and its corollary, venereal disease, will rub their eyes when they read Secretary Garrison's first annual report. The rate for alcoholism with troops serving in the United States was, he says, lower in 1912-13 than in any year since 1873, with the exception of the war year of 1898. As for venereal disease, last year Secretary Stimson reported that the American army's record was "shameful beyond that of the army of any other civilized nation"; this year, Secretary Garrison says, the admission rate to hospitals for venereal disease has been reduced to less than one-half of the average annual rate for the five preceding years. What has worked these miracles? Chiefly a simple little law passed by Congress stopping the pay of officers and enlisted men incapacitated for duty by reason of drink or shameful disease. This legislation went into effect on September 12, 1912, and therefore affected but nine and one-half months; a still more favorable showing is expected for the year 1913-14, particularly as the army medical authorities have bestirred themselves and have lent valuable aid by a campaign of education and of compulsory prophylaxis.

Army opinion is turning more and more to the abolition of isolated army posts, those costly suburban villages whose very isolation and restraints make for restlessness and disorder. In their place, wherever possible, progressive officers hope to see our troops placed in barracks in cities, precisely as is the case in Europe and England. Then the canteen problem would solve itself, and if the men drank more than was good for them in the saloons of the town, the punishment could be of the sternest. Human nature is the same the world over; if German and French and British troops can be made to behave amid urban temptations, ours can similarly be controlled, unless our officers are unequal to the task.

The dedication of "Grundy County's new $80,000 court house" in northern Illinois is noteworthy for the sort of political discussion of which it was made the occasion. Twelve words sufficed for the actual dedication, but the main part of the speechmaking was concerned with some of the most important issues of the day. Ex-Speaker Cannon spoke against the initiative and referendum, the recall of judges and decisions, Presidential primaries, and the direct election of President. A representative of Gov. Dunne spoke in favor of all of these changes, and a Chicago judge spoke against the recall of judges and decisions. Neither appeals to partisanship nor personalities were indulged in. Surely, this is the stuff of which public opinion is made. There is appropriateness in such a discussion in the State that had the privilege of hearing the Lincoln-Douglas debates, and no reason exists, except the unwillingness of speakers, why the same kind of thing should not be more frequent everywhere.

If there were any marks of irritability in the speech of the New Haven's new president before the Railway Business Association in New York, they are easily comprehensible in the light of contemporary events. But there can be no doubt that President Elliott's statement of the case of the railways against the Government in the matter of remuneration for the carrying of the mails is well founded. His protest against the prevailing method of fixing remuneration on the basis of weighings made once in four years is by no means so forceful as his explanation regarding the parcel-post problem. The four-year arrangement is one that has long been in effect, and in the absence of any violent protests by the railways hitherto may be assumed to have worked justly in the long run. A normal increase in mail traffic during these four years was assumed and presumably discounted in advance. But no such sudden increase as that occasioned by the parcel post was contemplated, and there cannot be the least doubt that the railways should be compensated proportionately, nor that they will be. Postmaster-General Burleson has already spoken out to that effect, and Congress will be urged to make the necessary appropriation. To charge "deliberate fraud" by the Government is absurd.

The simultaneous award of two Nobel prizes—the year 1912 was not a year for friends of peace to rejoice over—to a statesman in the person of Elihu Root and to a professor of international law, is in accordance with precedent. In both cases the prize has been worthily bestowed. Some day, however, it is to be hoped that the administrators of the Nobel Fund will depart from the custom of choosing between professors of law and high officers of state and confer their peace prize on a class of men whose services have hitherto been unrecognized. We refer to a man like Dr. Karl Liebknecht, whose exposure of the intimate relations existing between gun manufacturers and army officials affords an excellent insight into the workings of armament politics. Or the Nobel Fund directors might reward the enterprising reporter or special correspondent who procured the other day for the Paris Matin copies of the secret treaties between Bulgaria and Servia, in which the shrewd and unscrupulous game played by the great chancelleries of Europe on the eve of the Balkan War is brought to light. It is an open question whether such disclosures of the commercial and diplomatic wire-pulling that drives nations into "inevitable" and sanguinary wars, are not as powerful an agent for peace as the books of professors of international law or the acts of statesmen.

Of the countless theories brought forward to explain the disappearance of the Mona Lisa from the Louvre, the simplest one seems to stand a chance of being justified by the facts: that the theft, namely, was the act of a madman. The young Italian who confesses to having stolen Da Vinci's masterpiece in revenge for Napoleon's looting of Italy's treasures would very well fit the case of a motive of revenge taking shape in a disordered brain. Revenge or madness alone would induce a man to steal a treasure that could not be disposed of, unless to one of those fantastic art-lovers of whom Balzac used to write who might gloat in secret over a possession they never dare avow. Of the authenticity of the recovered portrait there would seem to be little question, after the opinion of the highly competent Italian experts. The manner of its abstraction from the Louvre, like all magnificent acts of audacity, was simple to a degree. The portrait was not destroyed by acid, it was not stolen by the French Minister of Fine Arts, it was not spirited away in an aeroplane. A workman put the picture under his blouse and carried it off.

It must be assumed that the person or persons who sent out the false wireless reports of a fire on the steamer Rio Grande thought they were doing no more than playing a practical joke. They could hardly have been so deliberately inhuman as to take the risks they did take maliciously. Yet it is not at all impossible for just such a hoax to cause destruction of life and property. Suppose that another vessel had actually been on fire or in distress, and sending out wireless calls for help. These calls might have failed to reach the vessels racing towards the Rio Grande, owing to their getting out of range of the messages; or they might have believed their first duty to be on behalf of the steamer first summoning their aid. Indeed, the calls sent out as a hoax would be likely to picture an especially dangerous condition, such as to lead a vessel to turn its course in the direction of the ship that did not require help rather than in the direction of the one that did. The least that the Government can do is to make the thorough investigation that is promised; but surely no one operating the wireless "for fun" will indulge in pranks of this sort, if he once realizes the peril in which he may be placing whole shiploads of human beings.

Members of society saw themselves in moving-pictures last night and enjoyed the novelty immensely.

Robert Burns's famous prayer has been answered. The gift has been given us to see ourselves as others see us. If society has enjoyed the revelation, it is to be congratulated. It is not always that the sight of one's own unfamiliar profile or the sound of one's unfamiliar voice is conducive to satisfaction. The motion film, in conjunction with the phonograph, thus directed to self-study, can be made of enormous educational value and a factor for the increase of human happiness. Take the after-dinner speaker. A cinematograph presentation of himself, erect above rows of heads bent in submission, reinforced by a phonographic reproduction of himself staggering on through a Serbonian bog of platitudes and imbecilities, would make an extraordinary impression in the cold light of the morning after. The swelling tide of oratory will experience a remarkable subsidence when a speaker begins wondering whether he could really have been so big an idiot as he looks and sounds.

Said Mr. Taft the other night with regard to Mexico:

All that those of us who are not in the Government can do is to support the hands of the President and the Secretary of State and to present to the European Powers and the world a solid front, with the prayer that the policy which is being pursued, whatever it may be, will be a successful one and relieve us from the awful burden of such a war as I have described.

One can only contrast the manly tone of this plea for calm and conscience in the face of a great emergency with the partisan outcry from Progressive quarters against President Wilson's "do-nothing" policy. Repeatedly we have been asked to consider how the Mexican question would have been settled in a jiffy if affairs were in the hands of some one who shall here be nameless, but who is now on the way from Paraguay into the Amazon forest. Just what would have been done to settle the Mexican difficulty off-hand, we are not told. Apparently, interest lies less in the point that something would be done by this nameless statesman than that there would be something doing.

The defeat of the rebels at Tampico emphasizes the obstinacy of the present struggle as compared with the two previous campaigns, since the outbreak of civil war in Mexico. It was in November, 1910, that the forces of Francisco Madero began operations. By May of the following year President Diaz had abdicated and Madero had made his entrance into the capital. The counter-revolution headed by Orozco came into being in February, 1912, and met discomfiture in about half a year, the Felix Diaz coup at Vera Cruz in October being in the nature of an isolated demonstration. The present campaign against Huerta began in March and has now been nearly ten months under way, although it is only within the last three months that the rebel offensive has assumed considerable proportions. It is notable also that the fate of Porfirio Diaz was decided in the northern States. This was true of the revolution headed by Orozco, whose downfall came at Torreon. The present fighting is much more obstinate. The Constitutionalists have pressed closer to the capital than in the two earlier uprisings, and have felt themselves strong enough to undertake an assault on a sea-coast town. But Huerta, though more closely pressed than either of his predecessors in office, is fighting back valiantly.

To describe the action of the British Trade-Union Congress, in rejecting by a heavy vote the proposal of a general sympathetic strike in support of the Dublin workers, as a blow at "Larkinism," would be hasty. Thereby the meaning is conveyed that Larkinism is a species of blatant demagoguery, a campaign for personal aggrandizement, without justification in the facts of life and labor in the Irish capital. The truth is that Larkin's is a passionate and possibly unrestrained voice, which nevertheless the conscience of the British nation at large has recognized as a voice crying out against the well-nigh intolerable conditions to which the working class of Dublin is subjected. In voting down Larkin the man of wrath, the British trade-unionists have simply declared that the spirit of wrath is not the state of mind in which to carry on a successful campaign of any kind, and especially so formidable a movement as a general strike. British labor in recent years has had experience with general strikes more or less complete, and has discovered, as labor all over the world has discovered, that the general strike is a weapon not lightly to be brought into play.

Viceroy Hardinge's recent speech at Madras defending the Hindus in South Africa contains some statements so straightforward that it is not strange much of the English press characterized it as a grave indiscretion. He spoke of the Hindus' "passive resistance" to laws which they regarded as invidious and unjust. "They have the deep and burning sympathy of India, and also of those who, like myself, without being Indians, sympathize with the people of the country." And the Viceroy went on to mention reports of repressive measures "which would not be tolerated for a moment in any country claiming to be civilized," adding that these reports had been imperfectly denied by the Government of South Africa. Such a speech was certainly not calculated to allay feeling, but there is no doubt of the Viceroy's sincerity. If he could display such heat, it is evident that native sentiment is acute indeed. When news of the speech was received in South Africa, Gen. Botha replied with much resentment, challenging Lord Hardinge to bring any alleged cruelties under investigation. Thus the Empire has the spectacle of not merely two of its peoples, but two of its Governments, at odds.

THE ART DIPLOMATIC.

"Your art diplomatic," once exclaimed Coleridge, "is stuff!" He was declaiming against the conventions and absurd rigmarole and roundaboutness of diplomatic intercourse, and stoutly contended that sensible men did not do business in that way. But what would Coleridge have said of a system of appointing diplomatic representatives which resulted in the choice of men who neither knew anything about the technique of their calling, nor had any real fitness for the actual duties of their position? He would have used some word more picturesque than "stuff," we may be sure. The National Civil Service Reform League has to be more polite, yet at its annual meeting in Boston, last week, it made pointed reference to the way in which our diplomatic service has been injured by the Wilson Administration.

As to other matters affecting the civil service, the League made hearty recognition of what President Wilson has stood for. What he has done is partly to be measured by what he has resisted. Congress has made several assaults on the reformed methods. To some of these Mr. Wilson has given way in form, so far as concerns signing bills with vicious "riders" upon them, but has announced his purpose, nevertheless, to keep in effect the principles of the merit system. For this and for his other acts in keeping off the thronging spoilsmen, the League accords him due praise. But the diplomatic appointments are the sore spot. As President Eliot put the matter in his address, the complaint is not only that Ambassadors and Ministers have been dismissed, but that they have been replaced by untrained men. The gravamen of the charge lies in the treatment of Ministers. Out of 35 in the service, 22 have been replaced by appointees whose diplomatic and other abilities have been sedulously concealed from the public. And several of the Ministers removed had the advantage of long experience and were specially competent. To turn them out in order to give room for greenhorns is surely to make "stuff," or something worse, of the American diplomatic service.

There is, of course, in all this no charge that any civil-service law has been violated. Ambassadors and Ministers are without protection in their offices. Too often the sport of politics themselves, they always walk, as Lowell said that he did, like St. Denis, with their heads under their arms. This has been a long-standing folly and disgrace. But the point is that an effort had been under way to make an inroad upon this pie-counter theory of diplomatic appointments. The shame of it had taken hold of President Roosevelt and President Taft, and they had set about humble beginnings of a reformation, looking towards something like a permanent career for able men devoting themselves to the diplomatic service. Young men of talent were named, without political dictation, as secretaries of legation. In the State Department an efficiency record was kept for them, and they were promoted when vacancies occurred and they had shown exceptional capacity to fill these. Finally, after a few years of training, several of them were appointed Ministers, in comparatively unimportant legations, all as a recognition for ability displayed, and as an earnest of a better system. But now nearly every one of these Ministers, who had fairly earned their positions without any aid from political influence, is turned adrift at the demand of politicians. Of what use is it, under such circumstances, to point to the fact that many secretaries of legation have been retained? What outlook have they? If they prove themselves unusually capable, they will be promoted, it is said; yes, but will they not think, in view of what has happened, that promotion will mean simply an invitation to mount the guillotine and have their heads cut off? If this thing is to go on, the obvious effect will be to put a premium upon stupidity or inefficiency on the part of young secretaries of legation, and to throw knowledge and skill out of the window as so much trash.

For the harm that has been done to the diplomatic service President Eliot chiefly blames Mr. Bryan. This appears to be on the theory of Charles II, that his words were his own, but his acts his Ministers'. Of course, President Wilson must bear the ultimate responsibility. It is very likely true that the President turned over to the Secretary the work of selecting the appointees to minor diplomatic positions. It is certain that several of Mr. Bryan's friends have turned up in these offices. Considering the great pressure of work put upon Mr. Wilson, it is not surprising that he desired the Secretary of State to relieve him of a part of it. But when a principle was at stake, involving the good of the service and the hope of its steady betterment in the future, he should have laid down a rule for Mr. Bryan to observe. It would have been both easy and right for the President to single out the few Ministers who had risen by desert, and against whom there were no charges, and to order that those men should be kept. They could be transferred, if desirable, but must not be dismissed as if they were so many janitors. If something of this kind had been done, there would have been little complaint about the removal of Ambassadors, frankly political appointees as most of them were—though there might still have been criticism of some of their designated successors—and the hope of opening at last a permanent career in American diplomacy would not have seemed to be wantonly strangled in its cradle.

SENATOR ROOT ON THE BANKING BILL.

The speech of Mr. Root in the Senate on the banking and currency bill has been read by most people, we imagine, with a feeling of perplexity. This bill has been before the public nearly six months. It has been under fire of the National Bankers' Convention, has been examined by numerous financial organizations, has been publicly discussed by anti-Administration Congressmen, including some who had a hand in framing the Aldrich bill, and has been made the subject of exhaustive revision and amendment in the report of the Republican members of the Senate Banking Committee. But the singular fact is that none of these careful, experienced, and more or less hostile critics have included in their objections to the measure the objection set forth in his three-hour speech of Saturday by Senator Root—that the currency provisions of the bill are in effect identical with those of the Bryan platform of 1896, that the note circulation would always expand indefinitely and would never be reduced, and that the consequent perfectly inevitable inflation would be so prodigious as to wreck both public and private credit.

We say that the lateness of this discovery of what, if the facts are as Senator Root alleges, not only supersedes every other objection to the banking bill, but must have been patent from the first in its provisions, is singular. But that is no reason for dismissing it from consideration. The Nation has insisted from the start that the highest public interest would be served by the urging of every rational objection to the House bill. We have ourselves devoted considerable space to pointing out with emphasis what we believed to be the faults and dangers which it was necessary to remove, before the bill could be safely trusted on the statute books. If Senator Root's contentions are well grounded, there would be general agreement that the bill ought to be rejected.

Let us examine these contentions. First, Mr. Root informs us, there is no limit placed by the law on the issues of notes to regional central banks, secured by an equivalent amount in high-grade commercial paper pledged against them, and by a 33 1-3 per cent. reserve in gold. Secondly, he tells us that the bill makes no provision to compel retirement of any notes from circulation. Therefore, the sure result must be that our trade "would absorb" of the new notes "the maximum which the required reserves permit"; that a period of wild inflation would ensue; that our gold, as always, would "leave the country in which the amount of currency exceeds the legitimate demands of business," and that then the whole structure would come down. The two questions which arise are, whether the facts are accurately stated by Mr. Root, and whether his deductions are correct.

No arbitrary maximum is fixed in the bill for the amount of notes to be at any time outstanding; this is as true of the Republican report from the Senate Banking Committee as it is of the House bill. But that the notes, as Mr. Root declares, are "not a currency for which the bill contains any provisions compelling reduction," is entirely untrue. The moment any notes of one regional bank are received on deposit by another, they must, under heavy penalty, be sent back to the bank of issue for redemption. This clause, wholly ignored by Mr. Root, has attracted the close attention and warm commendation of every other conservative critic.

Thus for the facts. When one examines the inferences drawn from them, one is likely to be perplexed as to what the Senator has in mind when he says that the country "will absorb the maximum" of note issues "which the required reserves permit." We can understand this statement only if it means that as much of the currency would be absorbed as the regional banks could conveniently provide a 33 1-3 per cent. gold reserve for. Mr. Root appears to think that no limit could exist to the gold supply available for that purpose. If this were so, the recent well-known difficulties of the European central banks, in obtaining gold reserves on which to build up an increased note circulation of their own, would be indeed mysterious.

The Senator further warns us of the outflow of gold from the United States which would ensue whenever an inflation process should be under way. That sequel would be altogether probable; and with what result? The gold exported would be taken from the regional bank reserves; but when the ratio of such a bank's reserve to its outstanding circulation falls below 33 1-3 per cent., no recourse would remain for the bank but to reduce its notes. We have failed to find, in the reports of Senator Root's speech of Saturday, the slightest recognition of this inevitable and automatic process. Yet that process, along with the raising of the official discount rate that naturally accompanies it, is the historic cornerstone of the regulation of note issues, markets, and foreign exchanges by the central banks of Europe.

It is far from our purpose to discountenance any sober warning of possible dangers in the operation of this bill. We particularly welcome Senator Root's revival of the question, whether the bill ought not to adopt the Aldrich plan of an arbitrary maximum of untaxed outstanding notes, with a progressively rising tax on issues in excess of it. But we repeat what we have said before, that extravagant misstatement in regard to provisions of the pending bill will do far more harm than good. That the present bill requires 50 per cent. more deposit of commercial paper, as collateral for the notes, than the Aldrich bill required; that it does not, like that bill, provide that the notes "shall be received for all salaries and other debts and demands owing by the United States," outside of specific gold obligations, and that its authors rejected from the start the Aldrich bill's proposal for the use of the notes as part of an individual bank's reserve—these facts have escaped Mr. Root's consideration; even though, if our recollection serves us, he himself favored the enactment of the Aldrich bill.

BIOGRAPHY FOR THE MILLION.

One of the less conservative of French reviews, Mercure de France, now possesses a department called "La Vie Anecdotique." The matter that falls into this particular pigeonhole represents anecdotal biography. Excessively as biography in general has grown in recent years, this form of it has grown disproportionately. The vogue of the frankly entertaining species of personal history is one of the most marked evidences of the popularization of learning. All the social factors that have helped the short story, the flashy novel, the clever magazine article, and other products of New Grub Street, have won readers for anecdotal biography. It places no strain upon the modern attention which regards even Paine's Mark Twain and Trevelyan's Macaulay as food for the time before the flood, when men had long lives and endless leisure. It has the merits of unflagging interest, dramatic quality, and a suggestiveness that leaves much to the imagination, without actually requiring a passing of judgment. Above all, it tries to define from a background of history or society or art, in which few are interested, the breathing man—in whom all are interested. It is thus a democratization of the old memoir. It has given the lie direct to Lord Acton's principle, laid down in his "Advice to Persons about to Write a History," that "no public character has ever stood the revelation of private utterances and correspondence"! It is one of the extreme results of the tendency to discard the histories of men and "their times" for an account of personality alone. Finally, it has grown in favor with the biographer, for it is narrative, not analytic; it is facile, and it relieves the writer of much of his responsibility for a formal verdict.

All must grant certain of the claims of this kind of writing, from the few who read Plutarch to the many who find relaxation in the last volume of Recollections. But definitions are difficult. What constitutes an anecdote is a matter of perspective. And the only valid distinction is between works wholly anecdotal and those only partly so, for any biography since Sir Thomas More has some infusion of the element. All that many get from Boswell is a score of pictures of that oaken Englishman, with his heart in the right place, who in his poverty put pence in the hands of children asleep on the doorsteps as he went home from night-work; who wrote Chesterfield the downright letter that ended patronage; who did penance one rainy day in Lichfield market for an unkind word to his father; who went after oysters for his cat Hodge lest his negro servant Frank should think it an insult to have to wait upon an animal. But these are true anecdotes and give us a flash into the soul of the hero. The cheap current anecdote, which might happen to a hundred characters, resembles only a detached incident from a newspaper or magazine. There is nothing in it to chime with the constantly developing character which a really serious biography traces, and harmonizes through every change of circumstance. Thus the purely anecdotal biographies are like the picaresque novels, in that they may often be taken up with pleasure, but never laid down with regret; for they never acquaint us with real personalities. Much could be said about the baneful influence of biography of the opposite type, such as Sprat's "Life of Cowley," and Jeremy Taylor's funeral orations, which suppressed definition and familiar detail to aim at "moral effect and solemn grandeur." But the defect of anecdotal biography is that it not merely fails to touch the crises of life with proper emphasis, its concern being with the minor incidents, but that it fails also to touch the "stuff" of a life.

The question is not merely one of proportion, but of insight. Beyond the first duty in biography of making the essential events stand out, is the duty of developing personality and choosing characteristic illustration. But what process of selection is used by the modern scamped biographical sketch, with its collection of anecdotes merely ornamental or enlivening? Their dazzling succession, like a stream of Roman candles, obscures true values, and this is the more regrettable, from the great wealth of present-day social anecdote. In its flower, anecdotal biography belongs to recent times, when clubs, academies, links of a hundred sorts, draw into new intercourse the roster of the great. It deals by preference with literary men, statesmen of the minor sort, artists and adventurers, rather than austere fighters of the camp or parliament. It is thus sheer want of the art of true narrative that is betrayed by inability to choose anecdotes which illumine character. The true novelist does not forget his plot, or the demands of character-drawing, in attention to incident. The thousands who piece together chatty lives with the intention of thus disavowing any claims to profound insight, or the power of making final conclusions upon character, often expose a worse weakness—ignorance of the very principles of sustained story-telling. The simple facts would be less dangerous to them and more satisfactory to the reader.

Our flood of anecdotal biography is thus rather a literary fashion than the index of a new and dangerous attitude towards notable men. Multiplication of anecdotal memoirs will only the more certainly end in their classification as a sort of gossipy journalism. The same reaction may come that Edmund Gosse noted in the field of the bad novel, when he said that its writers began to appreciate that "there is less intellectual effort involved in writing a story of the third order than in any other work of letters." Out of the ruck may rise again the biography of sincere conception and careful workmanship. The whole anecdotal tendency is a natural accompaniment of the excess in the habit of modern biography. Nowadays any person who has ever held a transient place in the public eye is entitled to a biography almost before he is safe in the grave.

THE CITY MALIGNED.

Even so wise and sympathetic an observer as "David Grayson" cannot help doing the city an injustice. That part of the Friendly Road (David Grayson, "The Friendly Road," Doubleday, Page & Co.) which lies in the open fields runs amidst scenes of peace. The wanderer makes no deliberate attempt to deny that there may be evil and sorrow in the "pure" country. Yet it is his belief, and more than that, his purpose, to show that whatever of evil and sorrow he encounters on the highway is part of an inevitable scheme. Life's maladjustments in the rural regions need only to be scanned with an understanding eye to be revealed as something other and better than they appear. Whereas the city? When David Grayson enters the city it must be to find it given over to the grim turmoil of labor war. The men he consorts with must be strikers or labor agitators or dreamers of revolutionary ideals. He must not be long in the city before he encounters its most agonizing problem in the shape of a young factory girl lurking in the night shadows. When he leaves the city it is with a sense of escape. When he turns back to look at the city it is at a monster lying there in the valley. But he is not fair.

Here is a problem for the young thinkers of the pragmatic school who believe that the spirit of man is made over every thirty-three and a third years. The steam engine, Darwin, and wireless may reshape our world of ideas. Within a lifetime there may be revolutionary changes in the position of the church, of woman, of labor, of morals. But the belief that the land is good and the city is evil, because the land is natural and the city is an excrescence, seems to be ineradicable. Specifically, we may deny that the contrast exists, and the next moment slip into the ancient tradition. Specifically, we know that good can come out of the city. In the past the city has been the cradle of political freedom. In the present it is described by earnest students as the hope of democracy. In face of city slums we may yet recall that life is as healthful nowadays in the city as in the country, and that poverty, though more conspicuous and sordid, is possibly not more oppressive. City schools are better than country schools. City food is often more wholesome than country food. Hours of labor in the great city are shorter than in the small town or on the farm. Political morals in the city are not worse than rural morals. Great enthusiasms and great charities flourish in the cities. So one will argue point by point; and having so argued, will unquestioningly subscribe to the hereditary faith that man was made for the land and lives in cities for his sins.

So with the "drift" to the cities. One can see why this should be seriously regarded as an economic problem. To the extent that it destroys the balance between food-producers and food-consumers, it is a very real difficulty. But it ceases to be real when we moralize the process, when we describe it as involving a change from a natural life to an artificial life, from essential duties to undeserving duties, from honest pleasures to factitious or reprehensible pleasures. There is no real censure in saying that it is the crowds, the moving-picture theatre, the shops and lights, the dance-hall, that lure the young men and women from the farm. A moving-picture theatre is inherently just as moral in the city as it would be in the country. Dancing on a polished floor under electric light is quite as excusable as dancing on a barn floor under kerosene lamps. And there is nothing immoral in the attraction of the crowd. On the contrary, those who lay stress on the cheap amusements of the town exaggerate the appeal which those pleasures hold out to the farmer's children. It is not the specialized appeal of this or that particular pleasure which draws them, but the general appeal of that much-traduced entity, the crowd. Why not recognize in this longing for the city mass one of the most fundamental of human qualities—the longing for companionship, the primitive instinct to huddle together for warmth and protection and coöperation in face of the mysteries of life?

Mr. Chesterton has somewhere protested, possibly in speaking of Charles Dickens, against the uniformly drab pictures which we are apt to paint of life among the poor. It does not occur to us that drab uniformity, as the more fortunate see it, may embrace, to those who live in it, as wide a range of sensations and experiences as any one class enjoys. In pictures of so-called "slum" life the tenement house and the corner saloon are part of the same depressing reality. It does not occur to us, as Chesterton points out, that a visit to the corner saloon may be just as exciting an event to the tenement-house dweller as a dinner at a gold and marble hotel may be to the average middle-class citizen. The city as a whole suffers from being reduced to something of the same monotone. We assume that city life, as opposed to an ideal picture of country life, is one thing, whereas it is a thousand things. We assume that city pleasures mean the "Gay White Way" and the "lobster palaces." Yet we know well enough that city pleasures mean also the libraries, the concert halls, the museums, the decent theatres, not to mention the quieter pleasures of social communion and quiet talk and the play of healthy children in a million households. Item by item we know these pleasures exist in the city. Only when we talk in symbols does the city become synonymous with Broadway on New Year's Eve.

Sometimes the city turns. Balzac in "Les Paysans" and Zola in "La Terre" and Hamlin Garland in his earlier vein, have shown how the muckraking method can be applied to life in the open country. And every little while comes a Government report on rural congestion, a study of village industries, a symposium on health conditions on the farm, which seem to shatter the ideal of Arcadia. But the ideal is indestructible. It is proof against statistics and against reason, even as the traditional conception of the city is proof against them. The land obtrudes itself as the only rightful place for man. The city stands out as a temporary abode. Primitive instinct will not down.

"PORNOGRAPHY FOR HIRE."

The phrase is that of Eden Phillpotts. In a letter defending the rights of the sincere literary artist against the assaults of a stupid censorship, he referred in a single scornful sentence to "those writers who deliberately deal with certain facts and sink to pornography for hire." About them, or those who publish them, Mr. Phillpotts affirmed, "there can exist no two opinions." But if he had been in New York during the past year he would have discovered several opinions. He would have encountered many men and women, apparently of sound mind and decent life, who defend the commercial exploitation of the baser human instincts upon the stage. In what is, in its essence, a purely money-making venture, they have read, not high art—for there is no pretence of that—but great and vital lessons to the community. They have resented the interference of the police with theatrical shows plainly demoralizing, on the ground that in no other way than by plays could the "facts of life" be presented so as to convey a moral teaching of mighty import to the race. They will probably feel outraged by the action of the authorities last week in stopping another brothel drama. Of this we know nothing except by report, but it is apparently only a little more unblushing than several others freely offered to the public.

The thing is done for hire. This is the point upon which the worthy people who seek to gather violets in the gutter refuse to fix their attention; yet it is essential to the whole discussion. No one objects to having the dangers of brutal passions made known in the right way and on proper occasion; the sole question is whether they ought to be promiscuously exhibited for cash. On this subject a vast amount of nonsense has been emitted in this city within the last months. We have been told that the theatre was coming to a new conception of its high mission. At last, the stage was to become a power for social reform. A new dramatic "movement" had arrived, and it behooved us all to bow reverently before it.

What rubbish this was the simplest inspection of the facts would show. The motive in all this display of indecency on the stage is necessarily the touchstone of its moral intent, and that motive is, without any concealment at all, mercenary. The wonderful "movement" in the drama is simply a passing fashion. Theatrical managers did not tumble over each other in the rush to see who could first produce the most "risky" play, because they had suddenly found artistic salvation. It was merely the jingle of the guinea that made them prick up their ears. One or two venturous pioneers discovered that money could be made out of turning the stage into a clinic for the study of disease, and then the others followed them pell-mell. There is absolutely no question of dramatic art about it. These belauded moral reformers—of the box-office—would drop the whole rôle the instant they perceived that there was no money in it. Let a reaction towards prudery set in, and let it be shown that it paid well to be a prude, and these same people would go in for kindergarten virtues as enthusiastically as they now go in for the unmentionable vices. In that fact lies hope, for soon the reigning theatrical fad is bound to pass. With it, sensible people will earnestly pray, will pass also the intolerable mush that has been uttered about this temporary sinking into pornography for hire.

Wholly apart from this stands the large and vexed question of the real artist and his difficulties in trying to see life steadily and see it whole. Eden Phillpotts, whose own work speaks for the serious conscientiousness and sad sincerity in which he labors, puts the matter as follows:

A problem rises before us concerned with some human activity, or danger, or passion. We weigh it in the terms of art, whether it involve finance or politics, sex or religion; and should the vision grow and take shape and promise a live achievement, we embrace it. From that moment the matter absorbs our best energies, and we devote ourselves heart and soul to the most perfect, beautiful and compelling presentation of our problem that lies within our power to accomplish.

This is at least intelligible and respectable; which is more than can be said of theories that improvise exalted art and deep morals out of the ephemeral coining of money out of filth. We do not say, however, that Mr. Phillpotts satisfactorily answers all the questions which grow out of the relations of the artist to the public. It is said that he "must live"; but the austere artist should be the first to say that "je n'en vois pas la nécessité." That is, if he really is devoted to his own vision of beauty, he will make the thought of tangible and pecuniary rewards an entirely secondary thing. If they come, well and good; but it should be something like a profanation to him to suggest that even the best and noblest in him should be swayed by the thought of "hire."

NEWS FOR BIBLIOPHILES.

A little above two years ago, and about the same time, there appeared in England a couple of books on Thomas Love Peacock. One was written by Mr. A. Martin Freeman; the other by Mr. Carl Van Doren, of Columbia University. Each was an excellent piece of work, well written, well planned, and showed an intimate knowledge of the subject by the writer. Mr. Van Doren's contribution was the completest biography of Peacock which has yet been published, while Mr. Freeman's, though not avoiding biographical details, was chiefly a "critical study" of Peacock's novels, poems, etc.

Both authors referred to an article "On the Poetry of Nonnus" which appeared in the London Magazine for October and November, 1822, and which was written by a contributor who adopted the pseudonym "Vida." Mr. Van Doren comments as follows:

The London Magazine for October and November of the same year [1822] contains an article "On the Poetry of Nonnus," with considerable translations from the "Dionysiaca," which Sir Henry Cole ascribed to Peacock, an ascription which has recently been accepted by Dr. Young. It is tolerably clear, however, that Cole had no reason for thinking Peacock wrote the essay except the fact that Peacock was exceptionally fond of Nonnus. A note which Cole sent to Notes and Queries, some years after he had put the statement into print, asking whether the "Vida" articles in the London Magazine were by Peacock, confirms one in the belief that his previous judgment had been mere guesswork. Moreover, Peacock himself in 1862 sent Thomas L'Estrange a list of his periodical essays, in which he says nothing whatever of this one. A single article, indeed, might have escaped his memory; an examination of the London Magazine shows that "Vida" contributed no less than nine articles to its columns from October, 1822, to November, 1823. Two are on Nonnus, three on Quintus Calaber, three are versions from the Greek tragic poets; and one a general essay "On the Tragic Drama of Greece." No one really familiar with Peacock's verse can think the translation his; the prose of these essays has none of his point; and the last-named contains opinions so at variance with Peacock's own that little further doubt can remain.

Mr. Freeman writes:

An article on "The Poetry of Nonnus" in the London Magazine for October, 1822, is included in the list of Peacock's works. It would be interesting to know on what grounds it is attributed to him. The subject is, of course, one likely to be selected by an editor who wished for a contribution from him, and the writer's method of dealing with the received notions on the subject are mildly reminiscent of his polemical procedure. With this exception there is nothing characteristic of Peacock in the article, in manner or substance; the style is quite undistinguished; and the defence of Southey and Darwin, author of "the Botanic Garden" and the "Loves of the Plants," against the attacks of the critics, makes it difficult to accept this, without proof, as his work. The same pseudonym is used by a writer in a subsequent number on the "Tragic Drama of the Greeks," and is also appended to a series of translations from the tragedians by which this is followed.

It will be seen that although both authors decide against the ascription to Peacock of the article in question, neither is able to enlighten his readers as to who, in fact, was the writer. The "only begetter" was Sir Charles Abraham Elton. Most, if not all, of the articles on the classics in the London Magazine were contributed by him. His first series of Essays, which bore the title "Leisure Hours," began in the number for September, 1821, and was continued monthly up to April of the following year. They were signed "An Idler." In the May number the notorious Thomas Griffiths Wainwright, who was a frequent writer in the magazine, wrote the "Letter from Janus Weathercock, Esq." In it he requests the editor to "be so obliging to ask our Idler by the green sea, wherefore he gave up the fourteen syllabic measure (which becomes him so well) in the 'Hymn to Ceres'—remind him, too, that we have never had a satisfactory specimen of an English Æschylus or Euripides; and that some good things might be picked out of Quintus Calaber and Nonnus." An article on Quintus Calaber appeared in the journal for December, 1822, and was continued in the number for January and February, 1823; that on Nonnus as before stated. That "Vida" and "An Idler" were one and the same person is proved by the fact that the paper "On the Tragic Drama of Greece," printed in June, 1823, and also signed "Vida," was referred to in the editorial notes ("The Lion's Head") for the preceding months: "We are compelled for want of room to postpone the appearance of the following interesting essays . . . on the Tragic Drama of Greece. By the author of Leisure Hours."

The identity of "An Idler" with "Vida" having been established, it remains to produce evidence that Elton and the author of "On the Poetry of Nonnus" were the same individual. This evidence is forthcoming in Thomas Hood's "Literary Reminiscences No. IV," one of the articles in "Hood's Own" (First Series), and in Barry Cornwall's "Memoir of Charles Lamb" published in 1866. Hood, it will be remembered, was for some time sub-editor of the London Magazine. His testimony is as follows:

How I used to look forward to Elia! and backward for Hazlitt, and all round for Edward Herbert [John Hamilton Reynolds, Hood's brother-in-law], and how I used to look up to Allan Cunningham! for at that time the London had a goodly list of writers—a rare company. It is now defunct, and perhaps no ex-periodical might so appropriately be apostrophized with the Irish funereal question—"Arrah, honey, why did you die?" Had you not an editor, and elegant prose writers, and beautiful poets, and broths of boys for criticism and classics [the italics are ours] and wits and humorists—Elia, Cary, Procter, Cunningham, Bowring, Barton, Hazlitt, Elton, Hartley Coleridge, Talfourd, Soane, Horace Smith, Reynolds, Poole, Clare, and Thomas Benyon, with a power besides?

As before mentioned, Elton was the only one who wrote on classical subjects. Procter's attestation is more definite: "Mr. Elton contributed many translations from Greek and Latin authors, from the minor poems of Homer, from Catullus, Nonnus, Propertius, etc."

OPIUM-SMOKING IN JAVA.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I am not going to enter into a general discussion on the evil of opium-smoking in the Indias, and the possibility of prohibitive measures. I only feel bound to correct a few statements made by Mr. Bertrand Shadwell in his letter to the Nation on the subject.

Opium-smoking is absolutely not a "chief," nor a "general vice," among the inhabitants of Java. Recent statistics speak of only .51 per cent. of the whole population practicing opium-smoking, and this percentage consists chiefly of Chinese immigrants. This may show that "the inhabitants of Java" should not and could not be described as living on the slope of demoralization by opium.

The Government Regie of opium, far from having been introduced from mere fiscal motives, has been an experiment to replace the sale of opium by private contractors. The experiment has not been a disappointing one; in 1890 the contractors disposed of 105,800 katis of opium; in 1911, under Government Regie, 49,700 katis were sold.

Furthermore, opium is not imported by the Government in the form of poppy heads, and the Government works do not manufacture the poison. It is imported as ready produce, and the business of the Government works consists only in giving it a final adaptation and shape—which serves also for the purpose of preventing unlawful smuggling.

Of course, the practice of a Government in bringing into circulation a dangerous narcotic, does not suit my idealism, and I do not wish to whitewash the act. But it must be acknowledged that the now adopted policy is not a bad one, having regard to people who will use opium, and who would otherwise seek their satisfaction from unlawful and uncontrolled trade (a far more dangerous thing for the whole population, as then mercantile interests will try to make the narcotic popular). The policy of the Dutch Colonial Government is to restrict, not to favor, opium-smoking.

Undoubtedly, the treasury of the Indian Government draws benefits from the prices paid by the smokers—although these benefits are not by far so large as several other countries find in their duties and excises on spirits. Besides, opium prices are kept high, in order to deter amateurs. And it does not seem so unjust to find some revenue from the comparatively small group of smokers. Financial motives have absolutely not been preponderant in the Dutch Indian opium policy.

That the system as a whole is not an unreasonable one, may be ascertained by the fact that it is followed by the British Administration in the Straits, the Federate Malay States, Hongkong, and has long been in use in French Indo-China.

That prohibition would not, as your correspondent thinks, make "the vice cease at once," may be seen from the experience in Australia. And have not smuggling and secret smoking been recently started in the Philippines also, where prohibition prevails?

I do not intend to act as a champion for the Dutch, or for any system of dealing with the opium problem. But I could not endure to see the columns of a paper like the Nation, whose impartial style and perfect good taste I weekly appreciate as a reader, throw an entirely wrong light on the Dutch Colonial Administration. It is not fair to represent as a proof of the commercial spirit of the materialistic Dutchmen what is in reality the honest act of a Government which may pride itself on having placed the administration of its colonies on the ethical principle of responsibility for the welfare of their inhabitants.

THE HUNGER-STRIKE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The Pankhurstians have broken loose again, and the Pankhurstian hunger-strike, born of hysteria, has again been brought into play as an engine of redress. It is, in fact, a curious use of a primitive custom, which has proved remarkably effective.

From time immemorial the rejected lover has resorted to it in order to win the smiles, or at least the endurance or forgiveness, of his lady-love; every day the disappointed and hysterical child falls back upon it as a last resort to bring over the tender-hearted parent, who cannot endure to feel that the little one is suffering.

Neither is the use of the hunger-strike so very obsolete as a means of legal redress. It was in common use among the natives of India, surviving at Benares into the nineteenth century (1846). It was not called the "hunger-strike," but "dharna baithna," or sitting "dharna." It was used by the Brahmans to enforce justice at the hands of wrong-doers, usually to collect a debt. The creditor went to the front doorstep of the debtor (he had no back door), and settled himself there with poison or a dagger in his hand, and there remained, taking neither food nor drink, until he died of starvation or obtained redress, which latter he seldom failed of. Moreover, the debtor must fast, too.

The process of "dharna baithna" was the most effective known, for if the debtor went out over the threshold where the creditor sat, the latter used his dagger—on himself, not on the debtor—or took the poison; if the debtor chose to remain indoors, the creditor sat outside and starved to death, and in any case the moral responsibility for the death of the sitter, whether by the dagger, poison, or starvation, was visited upon the debtor by the community.

A similar custom was formerly in vogue among the Irish, to how late a date I do not know. Perhaps, now, it may turn out that the Pankhurst is of Irish descent, and this hunger-striking may be due to an inherited instinct, a sort of throwback.

Still, we must account for the extraordinary effectiveness of this proceeding as used against the British authorities.

Why should a dangerous criminal, who openly threatens and countenances revenge by commission of the most serious felonies, be allowed to go free because she chooses to starve herself like an hysterical child in disgrace? If a person who has suffered a wrong at the hands of another commits suicide as a result of the wrong, public opinion and, to an even greater degree, common superstition, have visited upon the wrongdoer the moral responsibility for the death of the injured, even perhaps to the extent of a blood feud. This is the responsibility which the British authorities have sought to escape by yielding to the hunger strike of hysteria. By yielding once they created public sympathy for criminals who, whatever their purpose, were none the less criminals, menacing public safety and public and private property.

HIRAM POWERS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In a recent number of the Nation, my grandfather's Greek Slave receives—in a pleasantly sympathetic manner, let me say—her accustomed funeral oration as a notable achievement of that illustrious but obsolete school of art, the neo-classic. Allow me to ventilate a few ideas on the subject.

Was Hiram Powers a follower of Canova and Thorwaldsen—of those artists who, to quote Short's "History of Sculpture," "made no attempt to realize nature afresh," and abandoned that "personal standpoint which alone gives an art the highest value"? I believe not, for, said Hiram Powers, "The human form is infinite. It is the image of God. I have found that, do my best, there was always a better in nature. Once knowing this, I have hesitated, and sought to find it, and this is the way to fame." True, Mr. W. J. Clark, jr., in his "Great American Sculpture," tells us that the artist deceived himself in this; thought himself working from a human model, I take it, when he was really working from a Greek marble. This argument cuts the knot at once, not even a wire knot could withstand it; but to eyes accustomed to the Hiram Powers portrayed by Hawthorne and Mrs. Browning what a strange new Hiram Powers does it reveal! To the eyes of an old lady of my acquaintance it brings a twinkle of kindly fun not unlike that, I fancy, with which her father once gazed down at a young visitor who was telling him that "really, Powers, your work is very good indeed." No, the keen, bright eyes of the American artist did not deceive him. They were often bent in reverent admiration on the masterpieces of Greece, and doubtless not without profit; but much oftener and much more reverently they were bent on "the image of God," just as he said.

But, Mr. Clark assures us, the artist's intentions really matter very little; his works speak for themselves. Really? Does Powers's Faith, for example, claim very close kinship with Canova's? Has the Greek Slave been sharing Venus's luxurious bath? I know, here we have the classic drapery, here we have the nude—the very canons of art which Canova expounded to Napoleon. Are not these conclusive? As for the drapery—which Powers by no means always used—Bartolini himself "felt a repugnance to contemporary costume." As for the nude, is Rodin a neo-classic? Is the general impression produced on the beholder by Powers's works one of academic subservience to form for form's sake? Let us see how the artist's contemporaries were impressed. Said one, in the Union Magazine, comparing the Greek Slave with the Medici Venus: "I have spoken of the want of sentiment in the Venus. The form is beautiful, but the face is confessedly insipid. The Greek slave is clothed all over with sentiment; sheltered, protected by it from every profane eye. . . . The chasteness in these [Powers's] statues is strongly contrasted with the usual voluptuousness of the antique." "It is less a mortal than a spiritual body," commented the National Intelligencer. "If we look in vain for the intense and passionate grief of the Niobe," said the Democratic Review, "it is because she is sustained by a more spiritual and exalted faith." Not form, then, but spirit; and the artist meant it should be so. Said the New York Tribune:

> Mr. Powers seeks to found in sculpture the school of Humanity. He would carry into his art that divine spirit which since the advent of Christ has been moving among men. The supreme element in all his works—as we have reason to believe—and in the Greek Slave as we know, is the Human. All this is something unknown to the antique, for the reason that Christianity brought it into the world; it has also been hitherto as little as possible expressed in the whole range of modern sculpture.

Is this not the root of the whole matter? Hiram Powers was not a neo-classic, but something much better; he was one of the strong voices that gave utterance to the earnest, reverential New England of his time. He was convinced that "the moral insight of Swedenborg, the correction of popular errors, the announcement of ethical laws, take him out of comparison with any other writer," and in the language of his art—in his Hope, Faith, and Charity—he testified to his belief. His was the deep love of liberty, the watchword of his age, which spoke in Emerson; and that true priestess of freedom, Mrs. Browning, greeted in the "thunders of white silence" of the Greek Slave his "Declaration of Independence." Was Hiram Powers a neoclassic? Call him a Greek, rather; for he, too, was the believing man who wished to symbolize their gods to the waiting people. CHARLES W. LEMMI.

COLOR OF ANIMALS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In the Nation of August 28 a charming book is reviewed, "The Childhood of Animals," by P. Chalmers Mitchell, and a sentence is quoted from the chapter on Color and Pattern:

> Patterns that we think conspicuous, and brilliant colors that we have tried to explain as warning or advertising, or for purposes of recognition, or as nuptial plumage, may really be for protective or aggressive concealment.

I bring up the point not as a scientist, but, being a painter, the word color attracts me wherever I find it. I find it again in a lecture by C. Hess, delivered before the Gesellschaft Deutscher Naturforscher und Aerzte in Vienna (Verhandlungen, 1913).

It appears that the gorgeous orange and red of deep-water fish can no more be distinguished by their companions—with volumes of blue-green liquid separating them from daylight and the daylight reaching the colored blotches only on the rebound—than a futurist's picture could be made out if hung on the walls of the Blue Grotto. Barnyard fowl, looking through their red and yellow globules of oil, as through a glass darkly, must suffer agonies of Langeweile (from an artist's standpoint); for even the wondrous sheen on the rooster's tail becomes only a muddy mixture of a darker shade than the other golden browns in his plumage. Many other creatures see colors as a color-blind human being sees them—as so many shades of gray. Bees—but I have said enough to fill us with pity for all our left-over ancestors. H. L.

Munich, November 25.

THE FIRST SOUTHERN PRESIDENT.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The letter of "G. H." in the Nation of November 20 ("Gettysburg, President Wilson, and the United States") contains one remarkable sentence—a part of the quotation from the address of Sir Francis H. Champneys—which reminds me of a similar statement made by a Dr. Hermann Diez in the well-known Illustrirte Zeitung, about a year ago (November 14, 1912). The sentence to which I refer runs: "And the proof of that is that the present President of the United States of America is the first Southern person who has ever occupied that position."

Dr. Diez, in his article ("Der neue Präsident der Vereinigten Staaten von Amerika"), discusses at some length the political conditions which were responsible for the election of President Wilson, and gives his readers considerable information about the family, academic and political career, and publications of the new President. And then he makes the startling assertion: "In him, then, a Southerner appears, and, indeed, for the first time in the history of the American Union, at the head of the Government (In ihm tritt also ein Südstaatler, und zwar zum erstenmal in der Geschichte der Amerikanischen Union, an die Spitze des Staates)."

Now, such ignorance of the rudiments of American history on the part of an Englishman, however high in rank, is not especially astonishing; it excites perhaps at most a smile in the casual reader. For we do not expect an Englishman who is not a student of modern history to know much about our Presidents, any more than we (if not Englishmen) expect the ordinary American to know much about the rulers of England before and after the time of George III. But for a real German and a doctor of philosophy, who presumes to give the readers of a journal of such high standing as the Illustrirte Zeitung definite and trustworthy information about contemporary American politics and statesmen, apparently to be blankly and blissfully ignorant of the entire course of the previous history of this country, is more than astonishing. LETTERS OF H. H. FURNESS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In response to a request that has come to me from many quarters, I have decided to publish a volume of selected addresses and miscellaneous writings of my father, the late Horace Howard Furness, and also a volume containing a selection of his letters. I therefore beg for the use of your columns to ask the correspondents of my late father to be kind enough to send me letters that they may have from him, which after being copied will be carefully returned to their owners. The letters should be addressed to me at Wallingford, Delaware County, Pennsylvania, U. S. A.

FRANCIS THOMPSON.

The Life of Francis Thompson. By Everard Meynell. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $4.50 net.

The fault of Mr. Meynell's book is one which it shares with most of the biography of the day: it is too long. The matter of length is, of course, relative, but we submit that 350 pages is too much for the life of a man who passed most of his days in the cloud land of opium and religious dreams and who, whatever estimate may be placed on his poetry, was in no wise a great personality. Mr. Meynell tells with unnecessary iteration of Thompson's insensibility to the fleeting of time, his vast superiority to the small duties of punctuality, and his ingenuity (like Hawthorne's) in escaping an invitation to dinner. These tricks and habits are in a way essential to a true characterization, but they should have been described and illustrated once for all, instead of being drawn through the book. And there are other errors of repetition.

But if Mr. Meynell has not avoided the reigning prolixity of the day, he has in other respects written a book which stands well out of the ruck by reason of its intimate knowledge and its vivid style. By this time every one knows, who cares to know, that Thompson came up to London with no other possessions but Æschylus and Blake in his pockets and, like De Quincey, with the thirst of laudanum in his veins, and that through a chance contribution to the magazine Mr. Wilfrid Meynell was then editing he was saved by that Catholic gentleman and his wife from the stony streets of London, and kept in the purlieus between civilization and heaven. As the son of that house, and as the intimate friend of Thompson, the writer of this biography has had opportunities that no one else could have enjoyed. In his pages the man and poet is presented to the quick. Thompson himself suffered from excess of reticence to a degree almost painful, and one of his best known remarks is his reply to an evangelist who approached him in Wardour Street. "He seemed to be spinning, like a falling leaf, and tossed by unseen winds of direction. . . . Out of confusion came a voice, 'Is your soul saved?' . . . The mantle of protecting delirium fell away; the voice broke in upon his privacy, threatening his reserves, seeking the confidences of the confessional. 'What right have you to ask me that question?' he replied." The complete revelation of Thompson's physical infirmities in this biography, together with the unsparing portraiture of his soul, might at first seem to lay the biographer open to the charge of violating the poet's cherished sanctity of reticence. But so much was already known and so much more was likely to be conjectured of his habits, that it was better to have the plain truth set down, and Mr. Meynell has furthermore written with such love and reverence for his friend as would have disarmed criticism under any circumstances. The result is that we know this elusive nature as we know few other poets of the past generation—if only it will prevent some clumsier hand from attempting to draw the picture over again! Thompson left voluminous note-books besides other manuscripts and letters; may the good angel of literature strengthen the biographer to destroy them, and so preserve us from that long dribbling out of the dregs of a man's genius which is happening to so many other writers.

We shall not undertake to follow here the murky path of the poet. Of the most mysterious episode in his life nothing really new is told. In the introduction to a selection of Thompson's poems Mr. Wilfrid Meynell had already indicated pretty clearly the facts that underlay the beautiful lines which had tantalized so many readers:

Forlorn, and faint, and stark
I had endured through watches of the dark
The abasbless inquisition of each star,
Yea, was the outcast mark
Of all those heavenly passers' scrutiny;
Stood bound and helplessly
For Time to shoot his barbèd minutes at me;
Suffered the trampling hoof of every hour
In night's slow-wheelèd car;
Until the tardy dawn dragged me at length
From under those dread wheels; and, bled of strength,
I waited the inevitable last.
Then there came past
A child; like thee, a spring-flower; but a flower
Fallen from the budded coronal of Spring,
And through the city-streets blown withering.
She passed—O brave, sad, lovingest, tender thing!
And of her own scant pittance did she give,
That I might eat and live:
Then fled, a swift and trackless fugitive.

Again like De Quincey (who was, so to speak, the pillar of fire and cloud that went before him all the way through the wilderness), Thompson was saved from the last extremity of hunger and exposure by a girl of the London streets. In the purest spirit of charity she gave food and shelter "out of her scant and pitiable opulence," and then, with exquisite grace, hid herself from him as soon as he had found a home, saying, "They will not understand our friendship; I always knew you were a genius." She fled to unknown lodgings, and though sought, could never be tracked. The main facts of this strange and tender story were already known, but we are thankful for the few details Mr. Everard Meynell has been able to add.

The most vivid portrait of Thompson in the flesh is that quoted from the reminiscences of Mr. Wilfred Whitten, who knew him for years as a valued contributor to the Academy when that review was edited by Mr. Lewis Hind. No apology is needed for copying out one of Mr. Whitten's paragraphs at length:

A stranger figure than Thompson's was not to be seen in London. Gentle in looks, half-wild in externals, his face worn by pain and the fierce reactions of laudanum, his hair and straggling beard neglected, he had yet a distinction and an aloofness of bearing that marked him in the crowd; and when he opened his lips he spoke as a gentleman and a scholar. A cleaner mind, a more naïvely courteous manner, were not to be found. It was impossible and unnecessary to think always of the tragic side of his life. He still had to live and work in his fashion, and his entries and exits became our most cheerful institution. His great brown cape, which he would wear on the hottest days, his disastrous hat, and his dozen neglects and makeshifts were only the insignia of our "Francis" and of the ripest literary talent on the paper. No money (and in his later years Thompson suffered more from the possession of money than from the lack of it) could keep him in a decent suit of clothes for long. Yet he was never "seedy." From a newness too dazzling to last, and seldom achieved at that, he passed at once into a picturesque nondescript garb that was all his own and made him resemble some weird peddler or packman in an etching by Ostade. This impression of him was helped by the strange object—his fish-basket, we called it—which he wore slung round his shoulders by a strap. It had occurred to him that such a basket would be a convenient receptacle for the books which he took away for review, and he added this touch to an outward appearance which already detached him from millions. . . . He had ceased to make demands on life. He ear-marked nothing for his own. As a reviewer, enjoying the run of the office, he never pounced on a book; he waited, and he accepted. Interested still in life, he was no longer intrigued by it. He was free from both apathy and desire. Unembittered, he kept his sweetness and sanity, his dewy laughter, and his fluttering gratitude. In such a man outward ruin could never be pitiable or ridiculous, and, indeed, he never bowed his noble head but in adoration. I think the secret of his strength was this: that he had cast up his accounts with God and man, and thereafter stood in the mud of earth with a heart wrapt in such fire as touched Isaiah's lips.

In the critical parts of his biography Mr. Meynell is equally full; whether he will be regarded as equally satisfactory, will depend somewhat on the attitude of the reader to Thompson's poetry. In his lifetime Thompson suffered from certain malevolent carpers who accused his friends of puffing his work outrageously. Now, no one who is familiar with the character of Mr. Wilfrid Meynell and Coventry Patmore and their circle will believe that they descended to any improper log-rolling or printed a word about Thompson's work which they did not hold to be entirely justified. But it is true, nevertheless, that the tone of their criticism was sometimes of a kind to suggest that their judgment was a little biassed by their fervor in announcing "the great Catholic poet"; and this enthusiasm was caught by a few other writers for reasons romantic rather than religious. Thus, Canon Sheehan exclaims: "But Francis Thompson, who, with all his incongruities, ranks in English poetry with Shelley, and only beneath Shakespeare." Mr. Louis Garvin declares that "The Sonnets [Shakespeare's] are the greatest soliloquy in literature; the 'Hound of Heaven' and 'Sister Songs' together are the second greatest; and there is no third." Mr. Arnold Bennett again thinks that he "has a richer natural genius, a finer poetical equipment, than any poet save Shakespeare." If Mr. Everard Meynell disagrees with these extravagant opinions, there is nothing in his book to show it. He, too, apparently, would place Thompson above Milton—not to mention the other religious poets of the seventeenth century—and only second to Shakespeare. Such wild sentences naturally evoked an equally unfounded depreciation at the time, and their repetition will repel a good many readers of the present biography. Thompson at his best—he has, unfortunately, his worst also—is great enough to need no such absurd laudation.

Mr. Meynell is at his best as critic when he writes specifically of Thompson's place as a mystic. He is right in drawing a sharp distinction between the vaporous, relaxing mysticism of a Maeterlinck and that of the true Catholic poets. He quotes the saying of Mr. Arthur Symons: "The mystic, let it be remembered, has nothing in common with the moralist," and to it opposes the words of one who was "Thompson's nearest exponent": "Mysticism is morality carried to the *n*th power." The distinction is just, and is fair to Thompson; but it is not quite final. There is still the vexing question, how far such mysticism as Thompson's, thoroughly moral though it be, is the voice of the conquering spirit and how far it is merely the anguish and escape from a ruined body. Rather than attempt here the solution of so complicated and treacherous a difficulty we shall close with Mr. Wilfred Whitten's exquisite characterization, which no one who has felt the magic of the poet's more sonorous melodies will deny: "Thompson knew that above the gray London tumult, in which he fared so ill, he had hung a golden bell whose tones would one day possess men's ears."

CURRENT FICTION.

His Father's Wife. By J. E. Patterson. New York: The Macmillan Co.

The excellences of this story are somewhat disguised by a style sedate and homely—at times even ungrammatical—and only commendable for its consistent unpretentiousness. Apart from the mere matter of wording, the story itself is a model of simplicity and cumulative power. Like Hardy's "Return of the Native," it is a tragedy in which environment fills the classical rôle of an implacable fate. The scene is Foulness, off the Essex coast—an island at high tide, at ebb-tide connected with the mainland by passable roads. It is a land of dull and level aspect over which a gray and envious spirit seems to preside. A superstition is cherished among the inhabitants that this "spirit of the island" is inhospitable to ambition and pride of achievement, and that whoever among them prospers unduly above his fellows is sure to be overtaken by some mysterious fatality before he can pass on the fruit of his labors to his children.

This oracle, significant of the temper of the island people, is fulfilled in the case of Aaron Rugwood. Honest, hearty, masterful, happy in his acquisitions and a large generosity in which pride had no small share, his airs of local great man soon bred malice in his neighbors' hearts. Yet it was his marriage to his young ward Barbara, raising the unnatural barrier of rivalry in love between him and his only son, that completed his spiritual ostracism. Nothing could be truer or sadder than the way in which the growth of this passion and the slow recognition of its presence by each of the unhappy three are described. And it is hard to say which one most strongly enlists our sympathy—the young wife who so bravely pitted her loyalty against her love; the son, tormented and purposeless, hiding a burning heart under his dreamer's melancholy; or middle-aged Aaron, desperately striving to fight down his jealousy and the overwhelming consciousness of his isolation. The book leaves us with an abiding impression of truthfulness and a genuine respect both for the author's understanding of his material and for his dramatic intelligence.

The Valley of the Shadows. By Francis Grierson. New York: John Lane Co.

This is not a novel in the sense of a continued romantic narrative. It is a book of miscellaneous reminiscences of ante-bellum days, which the author has chosen to cast, for the most part, in the form of fiction. Mr. Grierson's father was an English settler on the Illinois prairie in the late fifties. Slavery was already the great issue all over the country; the fear of change was in the air. Even the little prairie community to which the reader is first introduced was beginning to substitute politics for religion as its chief emotional stimulus. This community and its typical figures are described with a good deal of vividness, though diffusely. Negro fugitives appear from time to time on their underground road to Canada, and the slave-catcher and his bloodhounds are seldom far behind. It is the Lincoln country; we see the issue between North and South, and even more distinctly between freedom and slavery, more and more identified with the opposing figures of Lincoln and Douglas. The author is not at his best when he gets to a crisis. The actual meeting in the famous debate between the two champions is a tame affair in his rendering of it, despite a liberal use of adjectives. He fails to get the swing and the atmosphere of the occasion.

The later chapters carry us to the outbreak of the war, when the Griersons were living in St. Louis, and had the best of chances to see war in the making. Young Grierson acted as page to Gen. Fremont during his stay in St. Louis. A good deal of space is given to an account of Fremont's expeditions in the Far West, and one chapter recounts the raid of Gen. Grierson, a cousin of the author. The book contains a good deal of first-hand information about the conditions of American life at the moment of the great crisis. The illustrations in color by Evelyn Paul are of uncommon merit.

Molly Beamish. By H. de Vere Stackpoole. New York: Duffield & Co.

Mr. Stackpoole apparently set out to give us a light sketch of Irish eighteenth-century society, its wit and adventure. His success is doubtful. The only hint of Irish wit which Mr. Stackpoole has succeeded in bringing out lies in a marked addiction on the part of everybody to introduce all remarks with a never-failing "Faith," as well as in a particular optimism on their part in the presence of the bailiff. As to the amateur gentleman of the road, he had no sooner taken a purse than he threw it back at the white, babbling face, and rode off. Of course, they pursued him, and naturally he came for aid to a beautiful Irish girl, who offered him a hiding-place. Of course, he fell in love with her at once, and to prove his devotion offered to assist her in her difficulties—for she had difficulties of her own. She, too, had taken, not to the "road," but to society. And, Faith! her father had been trying to keep up social appearances on no money at all, and now the bailiff had come; and society would discover their poverty and give them up; and buxom Molly would then not meet the Marchioness of Blagdon at the home of Lady Dexter; and, Faith! she did so long to see her (all in one breath). Molly did go to the party, and was snubbed by everybody, when the door opened and the highwayman entered, introducing himself as the Marquis of Blagdon—the husband of the social lion had died, and this was his heir. And, Faith! he led fair Molly home in triumph to the welcoming arms of the attending bailiff-butler.

The Maid of the Forest. By Randall Parrish. Chicago: A. C. McClurg & Co.

In those days when the Indian roamed the forests of the West, where now is Ohio, led by the renegade, Simon Girty, only the strength and heroism of the soldiers and woodsmen saved the country to civilization. Joseph Hayward was one of the little less than common type of soldier and woodsman combined, and in one of his perilous expeditions he was aided by René D'Auvray, a French-Indian half-breed. Their remarkable adventures in the almost trackless woods are told by Randall Parrish in "The Maid of the Forest." Hayward's feats of strength and endurance seem almost beyond belief, yet there were giants in those days; men who never knew fatigue or fear. There are few dull moments in the story.

ANOTHER VOLUME OF SVEN HEDIN'S TRAVELS.

Trans-Himalaya, Discoveries and Adventures in Tibet. By Sven Hedin. With 156 illustrations from photographs, water-colors, sketches, and drawings by the author, and four maps. Volume III. New York: The Macmillan Co. $4.50 net.

In this third volume Dr. Sven Hedin concludes the narrative of his latest explorations in Tibet and the Himalayas. Starting from the source of the Indus and the lofty plateau round the Manasarowar Lakes, which were so fully described in the last preceding volume, he carries us down the long valley of the Sutlej, through regions hitherto very little known, to Nakunda and Simla, in British territory. Between the earlier and the later parts of the account of the actual travelling there are interposed several chapters discussing the reports of previous explorers and presenting a sort of scattered history of the discoveries made in the wild, lofty, and dreary country, where the Indus, the Sutlej, and the Tsang po (which in its lower course we know as the Brahmaputra), all rise near one another. These chapters contain interesting notices of Andrade, the first Jesuit explorer of Tibet, in the seventeenth century; Tieffenthaler, another Jesuit; Moorcroft; Csoma Sandor, of Körös, the famous Hungarian scholar, who went out to find the original home of the Magyars, and of many other travellers; and they discuss in detail the different conceptions of the mountain structure of this part of Asia which geographers had formed. The discussion is in parts rather confused, and the details could not be examined here without too great an expenditure of our space. We must reiterate the expression of our regret, conveyed in our notice of the last two volumes of Dr. Hedin's book, that he has chosen to describe the mountain ranges north of the Sutlej and the Tsang po as "the Trans-Himalaya," for, according to the usage of English geographers, and indeed of geographers generally, such a term is naturally used to describe a Region, i. e., the region beyond the Himalaya, and is not a convenient description for a mountain range or series of ranges. There is, of course, no native name for this range, or series of ranges, just as there was originally no single name for the mountains we call the Alps, or for those commonly, if incorrectly, called the Carpathians, or for the long mountain mass which forms the backbone of Norway. A general name has to be invented, as the names "Carpathian" and "Dovrefjeld" were invented, and Dr. Hedin has quite as much right as any one else to propose a name; but it should not be one which to ordinary apprehension suggests a vast region and not a mountain chain.

Those parts of the present volume which trace the course of the author's wanderings are scarcely so interesting as was the narrative of his discoveries in Central Tibet, and his account in Volume II of the sacred mountain Kailas, and his adventures in navigating the Manasarowar Lake. A good deal of what he tells us here about Lamaist priests and monasteries differs but little from what we heard in the earlier volumes; and though the descriptions of the savage scenery all along the course of the Sutlej are striking, they are less novel than those of the great Tibetan plateau. The long and narrow gorges of the rivers that descend through this region to unite, after traversing the Punjab in the great Indus, are extremely deep and narrow, but we are fairly familiar with their character from the books of English travellers, from Thomson and others downward. Perhaps the most dangerous passage which Dr. Hedin had to encounter was that at the village of Poo, where a wooden cantilever bridge, erected to span the Sutlej by English engineers, had collapsed just before the expedition to Gartok in 1904 of Capt. Rawling and Major Ryder. Dr. Hedin and his party had to cross the tremendous gorge through which the river foams on a cable of wire strands stretched between the stone piers that had supported the bridge, the fall of which had been due not to bad design, but to the fact that the timber, obtained in the neighborhood, had proved exceptionally brittle. In the Himalaya, as in the Andes, where the bridges that cross the deep cañons are usually constructed of bamboo poles, these crossings are the most nerve-testing experiences the traveller has to encounter (pp. 368 to 374).

A good many interesting notices of Buddhist rites and customs find place here and there in the narrative, and one chapter is dedicated to an account of the discussions that have gone on regarding the similarities of the forms and ceremonies and the monastic system of Tibetan Lamaism and of Buddhism generally with those of the Roman Catholic Church. Every one who travels in Buddhist countries is struck by these resemblances, and many hypotheses have been invented to explain them. Dr. Hedin, who seems to have been attacked in some quarters for having in his earlier volumes dwelt on the fact, here defends himself by quoting many Roman Catholic writers, including Father Huc, the famous traveller, and Cardinal Wiseman, who have done the like, and who have found therein evidence of a powerful influence exercised upon the Buddhists of Tibet and China by Catholic missionaries in the Middle Ages. One of the oldest of the authorities whom he quotes, Father Georgi, attributes the resemblances to the wiles of the ancient heresiarch Manes. Others ascribed them to the action of Satan himself. The whole subject of the evolution (out of the teachings of Sakya Muni and of the traditions regarding him) of Buddhist forms of worship and the hierarchy of Lamaism, is an extremely curious one, but with it Dr. Hedin does not himself attempt to deal. He may certainly be acquitted of any intention to wound any religious susceptibilities, for many others before him have made the same comparison.

The book abounds in illustrations, but we should have been glad of a map on a larger scale of the upper Sutlej regions. Perhaps this is reserved for a volume to follow, containing the scientific results of the expedition. Such a map would, however, have been helpful here, for on that which we find at the end of the present volume the author's route is by no means easy to follow.

A Traveller at Forty. By Theodore Dreiser. Illustrated by W. J. Glackens. New York: The Century Co. $1.80 net.

For various reasons, Mr. Dreiser's grand tour was postponed beyond the fame of three novels and the age of forty. It is an age at which, without much abatement of enthusiasm, open-mindedness begins to be possible, and understanding is quickened by a sense of the swiftness of the years. As to open-mindedness, it was already Mr. Dreiser's forte, and the trip gave him abundant opportunity to open his mind still further. In England and France he was personally conducted by an admirable gastronome and manager-general. Except when he slipped the noose, Mr. Dreiser was chiefly limited to disillusioned England and dissolute France. In Italy, Switzerland, Germany, and Holland he went his own gait and took his impressions a little easier.

In the pursuit of knowledge Mr. Dreiser showed enterprise. His London contacts were carefully arranged, but he managed to quiz a street-walker on his own account. At Paris such investigations were naturally part of the programme. Into all his observations Mr. Dreiser carries a keen, quiet curiosity that is pretty close to sympathy. There is an odd reverence about what can only be described as prying tactics. The style is fumbling and uneven, glancing at things, quitting them, and returning for a new try. The dialogues, which might irreverently be called "heart to heart" talks, are of a queer baldness and rawness. We have to do with either the complete absence of literary technique or with a rather special technique which is hard to classify. Since the chapters are undeniably interesting and the passing people often vivid, the effect obtained with the hesitant, half-nonchalant manner which is familiar to readers of "Sister Carrie," we may suppose that a special technique is involved.

As a matter of fact, we have to do with an attitude and a style allied to Russian realism. Absence of prepossession, desire to move with the material, an almost mystical respect for all expressions of temperament—one who has these qualities in high degree may hope to achieve a myopic humanitarianism. This, indeed, is Mr. Dreiser's personal note. He adores temperament in all its phases. A hot-headed and violent labor leader is admirable, so is a winsome degenerate of the Paris cafés. Temperament he will have, if only retrospectively. How otherwise explain the lugging in of Lucrezia Borgia at many pages of length?

Now, this kind of myopic humanitarianism makes an excellent observer for certain men and matters. It would be hard to make more of Parisian café life than Mr. Dreiser has made. There is just the right blend of sympathy, with detachment. Most chroniclers of the theme are cynical—which Mr. Dreiser never is—or sentimentally fulsome, or morally scornful.

But certain visions, rather worth while in their way, are denied to the myopic humanitarian. So far as knowing the France that was and is the fertile mother of great ideas, the new Hellas of the world of letters, Mr. Dreiser might just as well have stuck to Broadway. Again, his notion of the great art patrons of Florence is that they were "ambitious, struggling, vainglorious men." The element of taste and discipline that made these patrons true fellows of the great artists is ignored, for the sake, of course, of a fuller display of temperament. In short, distinction of any sort, especially intellectual distinction, eludes this sort of approach. Distinction is not casual, and may not be casually apprehended.

Mr. Dreiser, both in his novels and in these travel sketches, is perhaps quite logically the foe of distinction, except in its aberrations. Distinction means hardness and discipline, restraint of temperament. Too much distinction would destroy utterly Mr. Dreiser's favorite world. For resolving the undistinguished flux into its palpitating human elements he has a rare gift. If he is less than the great Russians whom he recalls, it is because of smaller moral grasp. His readings of life stop at a sense of flux and a ready compassion. His subjects are chosen as fluid and pathetic. Of humor there is nothing in him, and next to nothing of philosophy. The less meaning there is in a person or an incident, the better he treats it. He prefers it should have no meaning. Let it be a casual reverberation of temperament, and for his purposes it is all the better.

It is a peculiar art, for the artist is both in and out of his material; difficult to locate. That the art has an odd fascination, almost hypnotic in its way, is undeniable. Yet the perusal of this singularly open-minded book awakens in at least one reader a keen desire for prejudice, conviction, point of view. All narrow stable sentiments gain a new impressiveness after sufficient reading of Mr. Dreiser's patient, languid phrases. Why are Mr. Glackens's illustrations so refreshing in the setting of Mr. Dreiser's prose? Because they have sardonic humor, are brusque and superior. Their incisive, prejudiced touch leaves Mr. Dreiser's universal sympathy with a maundering aspect. The word is too harsh, but it does emphasize both the quality and the defect of his point of view, and naturally of his literary procedure.

Lollardy and the Reformation in England. By James Gairdner, C.B. Vol. IV. Edited by William Hunt. New York: The Macmillan Co. $3 net.

The present volume, the fourth of the series, completes the life-work of Dr. James Gairdner, who died at the age of eighty-four in November, 1912. Beginning life as a clerk in the London Record Office at eighteen, he continued in that service for fifty-four years. As an editor his work has been of the highest value, and has been recognized by scholars with gratitude. It was not until after his retirement from the Record Office in 1900 that he began to devote himself with the same energy that had marked his editorial work to the task of historical composition on a large scale. The result is seen in his "History of the English Church from the Accession of Henry VIII to the Death of Mary," 1902, and in the four volumes of "Lollardy and the Reformation." It is evident to any reader of this product of his latest years that Dr. Gairdner believed that he had, as his editor says, "a special work to do, almost a message to deliver." As a lifelong editor of documents, he employed, of course, the method of documentary demonstration, but gave thus only another illustration, if another were needed, that documents can be made to tell a story pretty much according to the intentions of him who uses them. Dr. Gairdner's purpose has been clearly set forth in notices of the former volumes (Nation, Vol. LXXXVIII, p. 537; Vol. XCIV, p. 367), and need not be repeated here.

It is clear that the present subject, the first year of good Queen Mary's reign, was especially welcome to the author. His method is not essentially changed, but this volume is more readable than the others, partly, doubtless, because it has a central figure to hold the narrative together and somewhat to check that diffuseness which made the reading of the former volumes a rather difficult task. Dr. Gairdner's problem here is to show the exceeding difficulties that beset the hapless Queen as she entered upon the heritage of Edward VI. He represents her as a rather timid, gentle soul, firm only on one point: that she personally would stand fast by the ancient religion and would attach to herself as counsellors only those who were in sympathy with this purpose. But where among Englishmen were such trusty advisers to be found? The answer is to be read in the completeness with which she threw herself into the arms of foreigners. "She naturally looked more for counsel and guidance to her cousin the Emperor, who had befriended her in past troubles and whose advice came to her now through experienced and well-chosen Ambassadors." "Was it wonderful, from this point of view, that Mary trusted the Emperor's very able Ambassador far more than any of her own councillors?"

This is the keynote of the whole story. Dr. Gairdner does not quite approve of the Spanish marriage. He refers to it, gently, as a misfortune for England; yet it does not rouse him to any vigorous denunciation such as he displays whenever he approaches the subject of "Edwardine religion." He would rather that Mary should have married in England or not at all; but he has all charity for her perturbed spirit, which could not be at peace until she had thoroughly redeemed England from heresy and schism. He has no sentiment about the poor princess Elizabeth, frightened half to death by her summons to the Tower, nor for the godly Gospellers who were now silenced as their opponents had been by "Edwardine" tyranny. All his sympathy is for the defenders of the old religion and all his contempt and ridicule are reserved for the—no doubt often loud-mouthed—critics of that unholy compact by which state and hierarchy combined had once held England in bondage.

In fact, with all this bandying back and forth of documentary evidence, we do not get forward one step towards a real understanding of the subject. The thing that really mattered was not whether one side or the other were the nicer in its methods or the sounder in its appeal to law, but that great, deep movement of English life and thought that constituted the true Reformation. Of this whether in the present or in the previous volumes of Dr. Gairdner's work we have very little trace. Only by way of implication, in his denunciations of every popular movement, his horror of violence except by way of repression, his contempt and distrust of all piety that was not regulated by apostolic ordination, we get glimpses of a world of passionate feeling, which might long be repressed, but which sooner or later was sure to find expression in achievements and institutions that are the glory of the English race.

Notes

The following volumes will be issued next month by Stokes: "The Soul of Life; or, What Is Love?" a novel by David Lisle, and "Royal Auction Bridge with Nullos," by R. F. Foster.

Rand, McNally & Co., of Chicago, have brought out among their Christmas books this year a selection of "Grimms' Fairy Tales," with attractive illustrations by Hope Dunlap.

Two books promised this season by George W. Jacobs & Co. are Prof. Frederick A. Ogg's "Life of Daniel Webster" and Thomas Martindale's "Hunting in the Upper Yukon."

Chatto & Windus announce a limited edition of Boccaccio's "Olympia"—the Latin text with a modern rendering by Prof. I. Gollancz—in commemoration of the six hundredth anniversary of the poet's birth. "Olympia," it will be recalled, is Boccaccio's lament over the death of his little daughter, Violante; it suggests the contemporary English "Pearl," of which it has sometimes been said to be the source.

The one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the incorporation of Brown University will be celebrated in the week beginning Sunday, October 11, 1914. The historical address will be delivered by the Hon. Charles E. Hughes.

A valuable summary of facts throwing light on the commercial possibilities of South America is given by W. S. Tower, of the University of Chicago, in the December Bulletin of the American Geographical Society. The population, productive areas, the transportation facilities, and the relations with other countries are considered as the principal factors. The opening of the Panama Canal, he believes, will weaken the hold of New York on South American trade. It now has more than two-thirds of the total receipts and nearly seven-eighths of the total shipments.

A late addition, but a very pleasant one, to the holiday books of the season, is an edition of E. V. Lucas's "Open Road" (Holt), with illustrations in color by Claude A. Shepperson. Of all the anthologies Mr. Lucas has made this "book for wayfarers" is, perhaps, the most delightful, and for those who follow the road in the comfort of their library chair this larger form of the book is thoroughly appropriate.

Dutton has reissued "The Private Papers of Henry Ryecroft," by George Gissing, which were first published in 1903. Gissing pretended here to be merely the literary executor of a late friend, who, after many years, spent largely as a hack writer, had inherited a competence, retired to the country, and jotted down the impressions which form the present volume. But it is known that the book, in no small measure, embodies Gissing's own experiences. Those who enjoy the quasi-philosophical essay in which nature is used for background will be glad to know that new editions of this exquisite book are still called for.

The reader to whom falls, in the course of his year's work, the reading of many new books, is now and then refreshed by coming upon a book written from the shoulder or from the heart, and declining to range itself in any of the familiar categories. Such, in an unpretentious way, is "The Mulberry Tree" (Dodd, Mead), by Winifred James. It is neither a book of travel nor a collection of familiar essays, but rather a miscellany written apropos of a nine months' voyage to, and sojourn in, the West Indies. The title derives from a fallen tree on which, as a child, the author first adventured in fancy upon the world's highway. She does not profess to have seen anything in Jamaica or Haiti or Panama that anybody with ordinary eyes and intelligence might not have seen, nor has she attempted to "do" those places in the tourist sense. For the tourist, especially the American tourist, she has a horror; and her description of a party taking possession of Jamaica from a New York boat is characteristic:

> Old, young, lean, fat, trim, dowdy; assured slips of girls who sauntered about as if they held the bag that held the universe; corsetted mammas, all shoulders and bust and no hips, sitting their chairs like the little short-legged, painted figures that drove the toy tin carts of childhood, and looking on with the sharp, alert gaze of watching birds. Cynical children with long legs and short socks who seemed to be stoically putting up with things; way-back fathers who came out of their fastnesses with a full purse, a great bewilderment, and a full determination to pay no more for anything than it was worth and not knowing in the least what it was worth. Young men with padded shoulders, enormous trousers, and bulgy-toed shoes tied with sash ribbons; spinsters out in their middle age to know the world; all, except the cynical children, sworn as one man to see the most that could be seen and do the most that could be done in the time, all looking out for information with the same intentness as lizards look for flies, all with the same awful intelligence and the same nerve-destroying voices. To hear 468 American tourists talking together is like sitting out in the sun with your eyelids cut off. I know, because, although I have never sat out in the sun with my eyelids cut off, I have listened to 468 American tourists talking.

Let us hasten to say that this observation was taken on our traveller's first day in Jamaica, and that during the months that follow the persons of whom she speaks most warmly are the Americans who, in all places and seasons, have risen to prove themselves serviceable as friends and delightful as companions. The villain of the book, if there is one, is a lone Englishman, who, intrenched behind his nervous self-esteem, and his copy of the Times, darts fierce glances at a world which always threatens to intrude.

"The Man with the Iron Hand" (Houghton Mifflin), by John Carl Parish, is the first of a series of "True Tales of the Great Valley," to be drawn in substance from the immense store of narrative left by the early French explorers of the Mississippi Valley and put into accessible form in recent years by the editors of "The Jesuit Relations." Dr. Benjamin F. Shambaugh is the general editor. The hero of the initial volume is Henry de Tonty, who was for a time the follower and friend of La Salle, and remained on the frontier in close relations with the natives long after his more famous leader's death. We call him the hero, but right here a difficulty inherent in the plan of the series makes itself manifest. Though the aim is to write history and not fiction, the form of title chosen is sure to whet the youthful appetite for a well-connected tale of stirring adventure, with De Tonty steadily in view as the chief figure. But the documents do not tell the story in quite that way, and a certain feeling of disappointment is almost inevitable.

In "The Spirit of Paris" (Macmillan) Frankfort Sommerville contrives to impart not a little charm and freshness to a well-worn theme. Possibly his assertion that the series of sketches forming the volume are written "in the French style" might be questioned, but at least they are not written in the painfully familiar style of the American who has spent some time abroad and returns burning with the desire to immortalize his impressions in print. Mr. Sommerville's concern is not with the monuments, but with the life of Paris, and he has caught and is able to convey something of the lightness and verve that give a zest to existence there. His talk is of Parisian men and women, of the café, the theatre, the first nights, the midinettes, the fashionable dressmakers, the artists and their models. Some of the sketches read like fiction, notably the account of the artist who paints nothing but Salomes and the very charming little vignette entitled Arlette's Second Life; but the author informs us that they are all real studies from life. It is unfortunate that the publisher has not seen fit to make the binding and paper of the volume equal in merit either to the author's text or to the twenty attractive illustrations in color done by half a dozen French artists.

Mr. Robert J. Shores displays his diverting sense of incongruity by entitling his volume of essays "New Brooms" (Bobbs-Merrill). "New brooms sweep clean," we learn in childhood, but our author would smile enigmatically at the mere suggestion of thoroughness. He is irresponsibly discursive and whimsically entertaining in his remarks. He is all men. Now he is a philosophical cook who writes to the "Editor of the Idler" on the true value of cooks and other unallied topics; now he is Percival Pigeonbreast, a hotel "sponge," who illuminates the Editor on the usefulness of that apparently undignified avocation. Indeed, one would rather like to be the Editor of the Idler if he receives other letters as quaintly perverse in their points of view as the twenty-nine here printed. They cover a wide range of interests in our metropolitan life, from "Is Chesterton a Man Alive?" to theatre programmes in "On a Certain Condescension in Fashion Writers," or such general matters, always treated in a strictly personal way, as "The Abuses of Adversity." The essays are very unequal in their cleverness, but a fair notion of the far from Johnsonian style of this most recent of Idlers may be gained from a passage in "Sartor Psychology" on prison reform:

> Though it will be a great step forward to dress these convicts like decent citizens, yet this is hardly enough. There must be a corresponding reform in their occupations and employments. There is certainly something incongruous in the thought of a man clad in a frock coat and a silk hat breaking stones with a hammer. Such a thing must appear bizarre even to the dullest of these unfortunates. To keep them at such labor would seem as if we were making sport of them. It would therefore be advisable to devise for each inmate of our prisons some employment which will be in keeping with his clothes and, at the same time, congenial and respectable. Here is a man, let us say, who has been convicted of larceny. We will make a promoter of him. Here is another who has been sentenced for gambling. He would make a good broker.

Some of the best essays in English on the principles and purposes of education are found in "Essays for College Men" (Holt), chosen by Norman Foerster, Frederick A. Manchester, and Karl Young, of the University of Wisconsin. The first is President Wilson's Phi Beta Kappa address at Harvard on "The Spirit of Learning," a plea for the reorganization of college life so as to give scholastic and intellectual pursuits a larger opportunity in the social life of the institution. This is followed by President Meiklejohn's inaugural address, which is increasingly recognized as one of the ablest defences of humane studies and the cultural college. Catholic toleration is exhibited in the selection of the other twelve essays in the volume. There are several chapters from Newman's "Idea of a University," some of the famous deliverances of Huxley on scientific education, Matthew Arnold's American lecture on "Science and Literature," and addresses by Tyndall, John Caird, and Frederic Harrison. Such a collection may be found useful, both in courses in college English and in the study of educational principles.

In "Holland of the Dutch" (Scribner) Demetrius C. Boulger furnishes a good deal of information useful to the general reader, rather than specially to the tourist. For the book is not a guide or a volume of impressions. He attempts to set forth in business-like fashion the facts of Holland's principal activities—her commerce, law, education, army and navy, her colonial empire, agriculture, art, and literature. To the accounts of these is prefixed a brief historical introduction, and there are chapters on customs and amusements. Statistics constitute no small portion of the book and are so arranged as not to be dull. It will surprise many a reader to whom the struggle with Spain is the outstanding fact of Dutch history, to read that nearly two-thirds of the present population are Catholics; but few who know a Dutch landscape will doubt that the country possesses above a million milch cows. We suppose that the author went directly to Government reports for his figures and that they are to be trusted. Yet the very limited knowledge of the language which he frequently reveals makes one uneasy as to his accuracy, and in certain instances it appears that he must have relied on French sources. So he writes

"Mooi Holiande" and gives Gallic forms of some of Vondel's characters. If "slius," p. 54, may bo regarded as a misprint for stuis, other errors leave one less charitable. In speaking of Marken, that now tourist-infested and spoiled island, Mr. Boulger says that foreign visitors sometimes go there "because it is one of 'the dead cities of the Zuider Zee,' but the islanders give them no encouragement to come again." To speak thus of Marken and to pass by unnoticed that shrine of artists, Volendam, argues nothing short of gross ignorance.

Unusually broad-minded in its view of many so-called "heathen" customs is W. Barbrooke Grubb's "A Church in the Wilds" (Dutton). It is a story of years of labor in the establishment of a Church-of-England mission among the savage Indians of the Paraguayan Chaco. The same author published in 1911 an account of the life and the customs of the Lengua Indians of Paraguay under the title "An Unknown People in an Unknown Land." While his former book will always be more popular than the present volume, to the student of the problems of race development both are significant. Owing to his philosophical temperament and to his intimate acquaintance with many tribes of Indians in their wildest state, Mr. Grubb's observations are always valuable. It is characteristic of the author and refreshing to the reader to find a missionary arguing in favor of allowing the Indians to dress as their ancestors dressed. Had more missionaries done this, there would be less chance for the ravages of white men's measles and other diseases to be laid at the door of the enforced adoption of "civilized" dress. A score of unusual and very interesting pictures and the chapter on folk-lore give the volume a stronger appeal for the anthropologist than missionary works usually have.

At the same time, Mr. Grubb's book may be highly recommended to those who have taken any interest in the subject of Protestant missions in Latin-America. Frequent criticism is made of the policy of maintaining proselyting Protestants in the cities of South America which are already under the powerful influence of the Catholic Church. No such question arises in the Chaco. The Catholic Church, since the expulsion of the Jesuits in the latter part of the eighteenth century, has undoubtedly neglected its duties towards the savage tribes of this region. Mr. Grubb has worked there in the same self-denying spirit of the early Jesuit pioneers, who thought nothing of living lonesome lives among the wildest Indians. His story sets forth in plain, simple language, unbiassed by sect or dogma, the results of one of the most striking pioneer missionary enterprises of modern times. The modesty of the man who has faced death in numberless ways during a considerable part of his life is strikingly brought out in the following paragraph:

> Nothing of note occurred during these three months, with the exception of an attempt to poison me, and the stealing of my food by Thlamosâmap, who laid the blame on a dog, and was promptly accused by his own son of being himself the culprit. But the burning of my hut, together with all my belongings, caused me the most inconvenience, for I was reduced to the unpleasant necessity of dressing in simple Indian garb for over a month, which won me the name of "Tâthnawn-lamum" ("The man who looked well, decked with beads")—a name which I still bear in that district.

Theodore Winthrop's "The Canoe and the Saddle" has been reissued in handsome gift-book form, with splendid colored plates, by John H. Williams, Tacoma, Wash. A likeness of Winthrop has been taken from a photograph of the time, and the familiar one, hitherto given by other publishers in a fine engraving, is presented in a poor line-cut. The work was first published in Boston in 1862. It is an interesting record of travel in California and in Oregon and Washington in 1853-4. We find in its pages humorous and sympathetic descriptions of the Indians, incidents of the woods and river, anecdotes of following a dim trail through the dense forest, sketches of uplands and valleys, and one superb glimpse of the white peak of Tacoma mounting above green trees.

In regard to Winthrop Mr. Williams has added little that is new except for "a number of passages and, indeed, several brief letters," which were omitted both by George William Curtis in 1862 and by Mrs. Johnson in 1884. Yet he has connected Winthrop's narrative with authentic history of the regions traversed and has scattered through the book, in footnotes and in illustrations not formerly used in this connection, many interesting cross-references. Indeed, we wish that some one would do for Winthrop's Panama records of 1852-3 what Mr. Williams has done here.

But Mr. Williams's edition is often careless in matters of detail. He states that he has followed the "original text," when as a matter of fact he has followed Curtis's editing. Why, for example, does he not say "flirted with the buxom thirteenth of a Boss Mormon" in the closing passage, instead of using the emendation of "chatted," which we have seen pencilled on the original manuscript, in a hand other than Winthrop's—probably Curtis's? In some places, following Curtis, he has cut or omitted whole passages. We could find other faults. He refers only once to Winthrop's celebrated novel "Cecil Dreeme," and then he spells it "Cecil Dreame" (p. xxv). He says he is informed (p. xxvi) that Curtis did not know Winthrop to be an author when he wrote the sketch of his life, in spite of indisputable opposite evidence in the sketch itself, which appeared August, 1861, and in spite of the earlier appearance in June and July of other military sketches. And the present reviewer has seen a manuscript letter from Curtis to C. E. Norton, July 3, 1861, which proves the contrary to Mr. Williams's assumption. An editor should seek corroboration before publishing. It was not, as Mr. Williams says (p. xxvi), the "closing incident" of "John Brent" which is supposed to have prevented earlier publication of that novel, but the incident of the death of Don Fulano, suggestive of anti-slavery idealism and showing the rescue of a "fugitive slave." The route indicated on the map (p. 228) is not well explained, and the authority for the picture of the "Duke of York" (p. 9) is not given at all. Nor do we like his reference to the "large circulation" of "The Canoe and Saddle" (p. 315), which except for "Life in the Open Air" was far and away the poorest seller of all Winthrop's books.

In "Chapters at the English Lakes" (Macmillan) Canon H. D. Rawnsley adds one more volume to his studies of that charming region. The present collection is of more than usual variety. Some chapters are brief renderings of the author's personal impressions of the district in cherry time or during the skating season. Others are accounts of battles fought and won to preserve some ancient remains. Three give us archæological lore, one paper even venturing back into the dim æons of geologic change, but always addressing the public of literary rather than scientific pretensions. Four of the chapters deal exclusively with the literary associations. The ones on John Wordsworth and Coleridge are carefully worked out from diaries, letters, and poetical references. The two on Charles Dickens are much more gossipy, one of them dealing more extensively with Angus Fletcher, who at various times acted as cicerone for Dickens, than with the exuberant novelist himself. For one who wishes to spend several weeks in the Lake District the little volume would be a very pleasant companion or propædeutic.

The recent Book of the Boone and Crockett Club contains more than its title, "Hunting at High Altitudes" (Harper), would indicate, since it comes down to sea level in an interesting chapter on the Elephant Seal of Guadalupe Island, and still other portions are not concerned at all with the question of elevation. The body of the book is a collection of papers which might well be styled Memoirs of the Boone and Crockett Club, nearly 250 pages dealing with the bear-hunting experiences of the well-known ex-Confederate Colonel, William D. Pickett, on the headwaters of the Missouri, from 1876 to 1883. In much shorter chapters Daniel M. Barringer tells of three days' hunting in "the Old Rockies," and George L. Harrison, jr., of ibex shooting in the Thian Shan Mountains. The remainder of the book is rather miscellaneous, but of interest for its exposition of the really notable services of the Club not merely to the cause of the preservation of game animals and birds, but to the cause of "conservation" in its broadest sense. The moving spirits in the formation of the Club were for the most part men already interested in the finding of means to check the reckless destruction in progress, and the Club proved the agency required to combine their efforts and push them to the point of protective legislation, with machinery for its enforcement. It is worthy of note that Alden Sampson, whose vigorous protests against the Hetch-Hetchy bill are well known, was at one time secretary of this Club. Its influence was strong, if not indeed decisive, in procuring the legislation necessary to rescue the Yellowstone National Park from the schemes of exploitation which had threatened it for ten or fifteen years after its establishment. The Club was also active in the establishment of our forest reserve system and in promoting the idea of "game refuges," such as have been established in various States. From its action also originated the New York Zoölogical Society, through the efforts of which the Bronx Zoölogical Park was instituted, and which was entrusted with the management of the New York Aquarium in 1902. The chapter which relates these and similar services of the Club has been printed before, in separate form, but has had no wide circulation and is well included here. Readers who know the facts will readily excuse Mr. George Bird Grinnell, the chairman of the Club's Editorial Committee and editor of the present volume, for the pride with which he refers to its aid in the passage of the bill placing migratory birds under the care of the Federal Government, a measure originating with one of its most prominent members, the Hon. George Shiras.

In literature Mme. Récamier continues to exercise the perennial fascination which was hers in life. The unique quality of the recently translated study ("A Great Coquette"; Brentano's) lies in the fact that the charm seems to have aroused a violent negative reaction in the temperament of her latest biographer, M. Joseph Turquan. Good men, and men personally disinterested (Michelet among others), have before now questioned the absolute spotlessness of this angel and "saint" of the Abbaye-aux-Bois. The reviewer confesses that to him there has always been something cloying about her excessive affectation of the color of lilies. It suggests the vulgarity of that English princess who was so solicitous that others should call her the Virgin Queen. M. Turquan, however, as if he had himself been foiled, with the ill-concealed malice of one who, even against his will, must vent his dépit amoureux writes, not so much about, as against her who was so strangely fond of men of letters if not of literature. Indeed, M. Turquan would even deny that she was fond of men of letters; he would have it that she merely allowed, or, rather, invited, men of letters to become fond of her. It pleases him to emphasize the scandalous story which others have only hinted at, to the effect that Récamier was not her husband but her father. He insists upon what has always been known, that she was of plebeian origin, and likes to taunt her with the fact that she had not spent her youth, as a grande dame should have done,

A regarder entrer et sortir les duchesses.

It is a mistake to believe that it was Mme. Récamier who reigned supreme in her salon; it was Ennui. That salon was half cathedral, half mortuary; there J.-J. Ampère became mummified, and the whole secret of its unique distinction lies in this, that nowhere have people ever taken so much pleasure in allowing themselves to be bored. This thesis is very well presented by one who has an unusually wide anecdotal experience of her time and who in practice at least accepts that old definition that history is organized gossip. In spite of the author's plausibility we must still ask why should she have been able to pervert, nay, even completely invert, human nature? The expense of spirit is here wasted, and M. Turquan plainly overdoes. One may be a very honest woman, if we dare modify Molière, and not make people enjoy being bored. This is a far more difficult art than living blamelessly or loving literature with an undying passion. The judicious must still believe, therefore, that she, who, when her youth already lay behind her, could for thirty years amuse the "unamusable" Chateaubriand and captivate the unwilling and so wary Sainte-Beuve, must have possessed other titles to distinction than an unusual command of the insipid language of flattery, the memory of a pretty face and figure, and an uncommon intellectual shallowness. To make so sweeping a condemnation of Mme. Récamier amounts to denying taste to the French literary world of the Restoration and the July Monarchy. But if M. Turquan's presentation is altogether one-sided, it is none the less interesting. He gives us what will perhaps be the last first-hand gleanings from oral tradition about an important figure in French social and literary history. It is to be regretted, therefore, that so catchpenny a title should have been given the book, and that the publishers should have allowed it to be translated by one who, among other gross ineptitudes, can bestow upon the gentle heroine "the smile of command" (sourire de commande).

The fourth volume of "The Legends of the Jews," by Prof. L. Ginzberg, has been issued by the Jewish Publication Society of America. As previously pointed out, this series of volumes collects, for the first time on so extensive a scale, all the Jewish legends about Bible characters, not alone from rabbinical works, but from Hellenistic literature and even from the Church Fathers. Professor Ginzberg refers for his notes and references to the forthcoming final fifth volume, till the appearance of which it would be impossible to appraise his contribution critically. But even as it is, his control of his sources, the ingenuity with which he has dovetailed together the various versions of the legends, and the wide extent of his researches are sufficiently evident. The present volume deals with the Biblical characters outside the Pentateuch. It is characteristic of Jewish reverence for the Law that, while it took the three preceding volumes to cover the legends relating to the patriarchs and the other heroes of the five books of Moses, only this one volume was found necessary for the characters of the rest of the Old Testament. Among these, Joshua, David, Solomon, and Elijah stand out most prominently and are each the subject of a separate chapter. Solomon becomes a Haroun Alraschid in Jewish legend, and the few verses which relate to his rencontre with the Queen of Sheba are expanded into a whole series of adventures. Elijah, too, becomes a popular hero in later Jewish thought, especially as the forerunner of the Messiah. The last chapter deals with Esther, around whom the folk-fancy of the Jews has lingered with special luxuriance, the only dramatic entertainment arising independently among them in the late Middle Ages being connected with her name. Dr. Ginzberg's learned work is an important contribution to the study of the Haggadah, or legendary development of the Biblical narratives among the Jews, and, when completed with the necessary apparatus, will form a valuable source for the development of the interpretation of the Bible by the people among whom it took rise. Incidentally, it may be added, it is excellent reading and would doubtless serve as seasoning for sermons both among Jewish and Christian clergymen.

At the end of this year will be published in Paris a volume entitled "Mélanges Bémont," in commemoration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of Professor Bémont's career as a university teacher. The contents will be entirely the work of his former students of the Ecole des Hautes-Etudes, at the Sorbonne, and will have to do with the history of England, whose politics and institutions have long been M. Bémont's specialty. Among these papers is the hitherto unpublished Journal of the siege of Louisburg in 1758, found in the archives of the French Colonial Office by the talented specialist on French colonial subjects, M. Léon Jacob, who holds degrees in letters and law from the University of Paris and a diploma for superior studies in history and geography, and who is also a laureate of the Institute. M. Jacob has published several monographs, one of them being a study of the effect of the Panama Canal on the French colonies. His Bémont contribution consists of some fifty folio sheets of manuscript and is unsigned. But the context shows that the author was an officer of the little French garrison at Louisburg. It forms part of the collection of "Fortifications de l'Amérique Septentrionale," composed of documents, maps, plans, etc., relating to Louisburg, among which is another account of the siege, also unpublished, the official report of Marquis Desgouttes, who commanded the French naval forces. M. Jacob's monograph affords several curious glimpses of the military customs of those days. Thus on June 17 we are informed that "the general commanding the enemy sends the wife of our Governor a present of two pineapples," and we learn the next day that "Mme. de Drucour responds to the gift of the English general by sending him a French officer with some bottles of Bourgogne." But under the same date appears this line: "The English have captured one of our frigates and have sailed it by us so that we can see it." On July 6 the English Admiral proposes to the French Governor that he shall choose in an out-of-the-way corner of the town a refuge for "the ladies," which he promises "shall be specially respected." And the chronicler makes this very just comment: "It is impossible to conduct war on either side in a more courteous fashion."

Dr. James MacAlister, for twenty-two years president of the Drexel Institute in Philadelphia, died at sea on Thursday on the steamship Caribbean, bound from New York to Bermuda. He was born in Glasgow, Scotland, in 1840, and ten years later came to the United States. After graduating from Brown University he attained prominence as a superintendent of education, both in the West and East. He was the author of several books on educational topics, among them "Manual of Instruction in United States History and Civil Government," "Manual Training in the Public Schools of Philadelphia," "Art Education in the Public Schools," and "Manual of Primary Instruction."

Science

The Putnams, as American agents of the Cambridge University Press, will soon put forth two new series of scientific books; the first will include works coming within the field of psychology, and will be edited by Dr. C. S. Myers; the other, under the general editorship of P. Abbott, will be a technical series dealing with applied science.

Bird-Lore for November-December contains, in addition to articles upon different birds and field notes, the annual reports of the Audubon Societies and field agents. From these reports two facts stand out prominently. The one is that the year is memorable for the passage of the most important and far-reaching measures for the conservation of bird-life that have ever been enacted. The great and widespread influence exerted through the introduction of bird-study in the schools is the other; 53,157 children have been enrolled in the Junior Audubon Classes during the present year.

There is only one blemish in F. W. Oliver's "Makers of British Botany" (Putnam), namely, the portrait of Sir Joseph Hooker, which is given on an absurdly large scale. The portrait could have been reduced to the same scale as the others in the volume, much to its advantage and to the general attractiveness of the work. The treatise comprises a set of lectures upon British botanists, prepared with care and with a good sense of proportion by experts in the different portions of the field of botany. To these formal lectures the editor has added a few other communications of an equally high character, and thus the whole ground is well covered. The general result is impressive. It compels those who have regarded the work done in the schools of the Continent as alone worthy of citation, to revise their opinions. Every student who has carefully examined the recent advance in British botany will be glad to have these records of the earlier triumphs in form so convenient and authoritative.

An attractive little volume, entitled "The Airman" (Lane), by Capt. C. Mellor, R.E., should prove of more than usual interest to those who follow the progress of aeronautics. The author is an English army officer, who, while on leave of absence from his foreign command, obtained at the school of the Farman brothers at Etampes an ordinary brevet. This amounts to little more than a certificate (obtainable in from three to four days to as many weeks, according to the weather) to the effect that the holder is duly qualified to continue his more serious training as a pilot. The brevet is not given, however, until the pupil, unassisted, is capable of manipulating his machine in flight, of describing a series of figures of eight, and of attaining an altitude of at least fifty metres. But to obtain the much-coveted brevet militaire a difficult series of practical and theoretical tests is prescribed requiring service of several months in the French army. The experiences of Capt. Mellor, now thrilling, now dull, were recorded from day to day during his stay of four weeks at Etampes. His book is written in the form of a private diary, in which are combined frankness and impulsive narrative; the following description of his first flight is typical:

> The Maurice [the type of machine in which he learned to fly] is provided with a double control, which permits the pupil to grasp a pair of handles on the control bar by putting his arms under those of the pilot from behind. There is also a second pair of footrests working the rudders. I am not permitted on this occasion, however, to touch the controls. I am merely to watch the pilot and see what it feels like. Well, off we go—straight into the wind. We run more and more smoothly, and I am uncertain as to when we leave the ground. We skim along near the ground, rising very gently. Suddenly we shoot up a steep hill in the air. I wonder if it is all right—we seem to be climbing so rapidly. Then we flatten out and go horizontally for a hundred yards or so; then another shoot up, and another later on, which makes one's heart jump into one's mouth. The rush and press of air are terrific. My chest seems to be getting staved in and my ribs feel inclined to give way. I have difficulty in exhaling. The smallest opening of the nasal valve seems to give too much air. My blood rapidly becomes super-oxygenated, and I experience a feeling of exhilaration.

The writer does not subscribe to the popular belief that aviation is "flying in the face of Providence," and contends that its dangers are considerably less than those of mountain climbing. The volume contains a brief introduction by Maurice Farman, a few well-chosen illustrations, and an appendix in which are given the rules governing the granting of various certificates in aviation, including those of the Royal Aero Club Special, and the French brevet militaire.

Prof. Alfred George Compton, formerly head of the department of physics at the College of the City of New York, died Friday, in his seventy-eighth year; he was born in London, England. He entered the City College in 1849, the year it was founded, and immediately after graduation became a teacher in this institution, remaining from that time on its faculty until his retirement in 1911. Professor Compton was the author of "First Lessons in Metal-Working," "The Speed-Lathe," and "A Manual of Logarithmic Computations."

Drama

THE STAGE VS. THE DRAMA.

The feud between playwright and theatre manager is of long standing, and perhaps eternal. Shakespeare, who was both dramatist and manager, in the famous prologue to "Henry V" affirms vigorously the inadequacy of the stage, and inferentially the superiority of the play:

> Can this cockpit hold
> The vasty fields of France? or may we cram
> Within this wooden O the very casques
> That did affright the air at Agincourt?

This subordination of stage effect to the recitation of the lines has prevailed until recent times. Unquestionably, texts have always been handled cavalierly to suit the whim of managers or the capacities of players, but until the breaking up of the stock companies about a generation ago the play got at least equal consideration with the individual actor and the staging. Where the stock company survives, respect for the play still is found. At the Odéon I have frequently heard in not too long an evening two comedies and a tragedy. Such a feat was possible because the waits averaged two minutes. Naturally, the scenery and properties were of the simplest—just enough to indicate the place and to dispatch the business. What counted was the sharp rendition of Molière's action and dialogue and the eloquent declamation of Corneille's sonorous verses.

In such a theatre one breathes the air of the golden age of the European drama; but such theatres to-day are mere survivals, supported not by popular favor, but by state or private subsidies. The modern theatrical trend is distinctly anti-dramatic, an exaltation of the stage as such against the play. Hence Huntly Carter's book,* "The New Spirit in Drama and Art," is misnamed. Drama barely appears in his survey. He does, however, give a comprehensive account of the modern theatrical ferment as it may be observed in London, Paris, Berlin, and Leipzig, and perhaps more significantly at Vienna, Budapest, and Moscow. In all he describes the activities of nearly a score of art theatres. As a chronicler he is enthusiastic and eminently uncritical. Whatever is new and sufficiently odd attracts him; he labors under the prevailing delusion that the arts must evolve. This biological analogy will hold when two plays or pictures unite to form a younger artistic unit, not sooner. However, Mr. Carter provides a sufficiently vivid and accurate résumé of the uneasiness and striving for novelty that shows itself to-day wherever the art of the theatre is taken seriously. It will be my task to seek the common spirit that underlies these apparently diverse endeavors.

I.

In shortest words, the new theatrical tendency is almost exclusively scenic, and generally anti-dramatic. Its most significant and most successful achievement is the revival of the dance, not as an incidental divertissement to the play, but as the play itself. The world-wide vogue of the admirable Russian dancers, the acclaim of Professor Reinhardt's pantomimes, are capital instances in point. The sudden popularity of the one-act piece is another indication of restlessness and of discontent with the traditional forms of the drama. Moreover, in its more significant phases the scenic movement is resolutely anti-realistic, here agreeing with the parallel drift in painting and sculpture, and here once more parting company with both the contemporary and the classic drama. Before following these several lines of interpretation and considering the value of the new solutions, it may be well to inquire how the drama was deposed.

On the one hand, the drama was smothered by elaborateness in stage setting, with the exaggeration of the star as a contributory cause; on the other, by the narrowing of the drama as literature implied in modern ideas of the right construction of a play. Whether or not the opera inherited its ornate furnishing from the court masque, is a matter of antiquarian curiosity. In any case, it was apparently the opera that early in the last century forced upon the theatre the most cumbersome scenery and accessories. Wagner is the central figure of the movement, but before his time the tendency was pronounced. In 1835 Eugène Delacroix admired the "magnificent moonlight" in Bellini's "I Puritani," and took the pains to note the pictorial method at length in his journal. Wagner naturally marked the high point in scenic elaborateness and realism. He has not really been surpassed. His perspective audacities in "The Flying Dutchman" and "Lohengrin"; his forests, caverns, and celestial bridges in the "Ring," his interiors as in the Wartburg of "Tannhäuser," his public squares in "The Meistersinger," have tyrannized the imagination of managers for two generations. In England Irving added to the tendency a somewhat pedantic and archæological exactitude, in which Sir Herbert Tree has loyally continued. In America Augustin Daly contributed the coquetry of a collector, setting his scenes when possible with properties of the period represented. Sardou made the spectacular piece international. So was lovingly but ignorantly wrought the gorgeous funeral pall of the drama. Scenic profusion became a substitute for well-balanced companies. Besides, where many intervals of nearly half an hour were involved, a great play simply could not be run off with that continuity which is of the essence of every artistic effect. Imagine a symphony of Beethoven with long intervals between the movements! To restore continuity, the circular stage has been contrived, but the true remedy is at once simpler and more drastic. What we need is not elaborate settings more swiftly changed, but simpler settings and fewer. Thus Professor Reinhardt's sumptuous pantomimes are not in the direction of reform, but of reaction. They have meaning chiefly as the last logical step along scenic and realistic lines. He has perceived that a spectacle of sufficient ornateness and dramatic tension requires no lines. The moving-picture theatre is repeating the demonstration with world-wide and impressive success.

To say that the drama has suffered from the logical over-sharpening of its own ideals is at first sight a paradox. Yet I believe that one might pretty definitely date the decline of the drama both as literature and as theatrical value from Eugène Scribe's famous doctrine of the pièce bien faite. It is about eighty years since he threw off the phrase which has affected all modern dramaturgy. The well-made play must have a closely knit and logical action with utmost economy of dialogue. Naturally all digressions, including all incidental poetry, are forbidden. The soliloquy becomes an anachronism. Everything must move swiftly to a satisfactory climax with the logical dénouement hard on its heels. No principle of relief or variety is tolerated. Dramaturgy becomes a form of dialectic. Powerfully reinforced by the mature work of Ibsen, the theory of the well-made play has been exemplified inexorably by Hervieu and Becque in France and by Pinero in England.

The doctrine has produced some excellent plays. Its weakness is that it proclaims all the acknowledged masterpieces of the acting drama to be ill-made. Under the strict rule, Molière, a constructor of the neat sort, would come off hardly better than the notoriously loose-jointed Shakespeare. A graver defect of the theory was that the well-made play turned out to be sadly epbemeral. Some thousands of pièces bien faites have had their day, but after eighty years there cannot be said to exist a modern repertory. Clearly the difficulty is that the well-made play is made well in respect only of a particular moment and a peculiar audience. Times change and with them audiences, and the well-made play of to-day, with its precise adjustments to our present sensibilities and prejudices, is likely to seem merely old-fashioned to our wiser sons and daughters. Possibly, what Scribe regarded as poetical surplusage and lumber was, after all, the unconscious appeal of the playwright from a particular audience to posterity, a denial of that relativity within which great drama has ever been reluctant to confine itself. Here I am not raising the vexed question of the literary drama. It is important for the well-being of the theatre not that plays should be masterpieces of literature, but merely that they should last long enough to provide a standard repertory and withal a sound tradition of acting and setting. But the well-made play has signally failed to do this, and therein its bankruptcy is revealed. Between the smothering of the play under scenery and the reduction of dialogue to explosive ejaculation, between the star and the long run, opportunities for education in acting have been curtailed, tolerable declamation has become exceptional, personal charm or beauty has made theatric intelligence superfluous.

II.

All remedies for the evils described above may be comprised in two main categories: first, simplification of the setting and rejection of bad theatrical conventions; secondly, the reform of the star system through a potent and enlightened stage-managership. Both remedies look towards the reform of what we may call the stage picture. Simplification has taken two roads: one somewhat archæological, as in the revivals of Mr. Benson and Ben Greet, another quite abstract and modern, as in Gordon Craig's recent settings and in the representations of the Künstlertheater at Munich. In most cases, significantly, the point of departure has been Shakespeare. So it may be well by a brief comparison between the Elizabethan and the modern stage to suggest what the problem of the stage picture is.

The stage of Shakespeare presented no picture in the modern sense. Shakespeare's despairingly humorous choruses for "Henry V" show plainly that the only possible and tolerable picture must be evoked by his lines in the imagination of the audience. His stage projected several feet into the pit, so that most of the time the actors were among the audience. No illusion of setting was possible. The actor was deprived of glamour and driven back upon the elemental devices of expressive action and fine declamation. Behind the stage was a narrower portico with a curtained door. Indeed, it is probable, though not certain, that the entire portico could at need be curtained off. Above the portico was a practicable gallery. With this meagre and fixed setting all places of a Shakespearean play could, with a little good will on the part of the audience, be sufficiently suggested. The projecting fore-stage was any large public place. Let us say, indifferently, a square in Verona, the ballroom of the Capulets, a street and a churchyard in Verona, a street in Mantua. The space under the gallery was at will a room in the Capulet palace and Juliet's chamber. The central curtained door admitted, according to circumstances, to Friar Laurence's cell, or to the tomb of the Capulets. The gallery was, of course, Juliet's balcony. All that the dramatist required was an indication that the place was large or small, indoors or out, on the ground level or high. When ambiguity arose, as it did but rarely, the lines set the audience right. Only the indispensable properties were used, and these had to be carried on and off in view of the audience. This still is occasionally done in the classic French theatre without giving offence. The actors had, with trifling exceptions, to come on and go off without the aid of the curtain. So cruel a condition must have made for a stately and commanding port. In résumé, there were no stage pictures in the sense of illusionary inscenation, either of particular plays or particular acts or scenes of any play. Or better, the actors were like statues set on a broad base before a fixed and impressive architectural background. The conditions were not unlike those prevailing in the Greek theatre and the requirements upon the actor were similar. It was a sculptural, not a pictorial, arrangement.

If the Elizabethan stage was sculptural, the modern stage is at least in intention pictorial. The proscenium arch constitutes a definite boundary or frame, within which the picture is composed. The lighting from the front gives brilliancy to the picture. By drops and flats any setting can be simulated. A well-painted back, such as Mr. Belasco presented in the last act of "The Girl of the Golden West," may open up miles of land and sky. Modern illuminants make it possible to reproduce the most fugitive and poetic phases of lunar or solar light. Mr. Daly provided in "The Midsummer Night's Dream" a moonlight that holds its glamour after nearly thirty years. On penalty of long waits, to be sure, properties can be multiplied ad libitum, mechanical devices of all sorts make the ghost an horrific plausibility and permit the bodily presence of the chariot race. A whole range of incidents that a Shakespeare could only describe may safely be put on in any country theatre. In fact, the pictorial apparatus of the modern stage seems absolutely perfect, and yet all the more enlightened managers are bothering about the stage picture. What is the difficulty? Simply that the actor cannot effectively be fitted into any pictorial scheme which requires more planes than a foreground and a remote distance. To the eye the actor diminishes inappreciably within the range of up and down stage. He belongs, and is in proper scale, only in a foreground which has no middle distance. Anywhere else he is too big for the picture. The false ingenuity of decorators multiplies flats and makes the stage a tunnel. No real effect of depth is attained. The actor merely dwarfs the scenery as he retires from the footlights. No actor can gradually approach from a distance or gradually withdraw. You may describe his going or coming, but if you present him in the flesh, the more you complicate stage perspective, and the more intermediate objects you introduce to express farness, the more you emphasize his palpable and ridiculous nearness. You cannot safely set him against any back scene supposed to be a hundred yards away. You must crowd him to the wings on penalty of his spoiling the picture. Against a very near or a very remote background you may set him with impunity. Of course, I am aware of the heroic attempts to defeat stage limitations in the ascension of the soul of the Flying Dutchman, and in the gradual coming of Lohengrin in his swan boat. But without the music both effects would be ridiculous—as theatrical effect Little Eva's apotheosis is really more tolerable—and Lohengrin's advent invariably strikes me as mildly absurd, despite the most enchanting music imaginable.

In short, the stage picture is in one plane as regards the actors, and in two at most as regards actors and scenery. Which comes to saying that the art of the stage is still not a pictorial but a sculptural art. A good deal of the recent reform of inscenation in England, Germany, and Austria has been in the way of recognizing this fact and clearing away the rubbish between the stage front and the background, with the frank perception that the actor has no abiding place in the intermediate regions. At all times the classic theatre has unconsciously obeyed this law. And some recent effective designs show a return to it. The scene already cited from "The Girl of the Golden West," and the island setting for "The Admirable Crichton," are examples. How compatible these limitations are with spacious and romantic effect, Gordon Craig's designs for Ibsen's "Vikings," or, better yet, for Laurence Housman's "Bethlehem," show convincingly.

III.

A reform which clears off the canvas and papier-maché atrocities from the stage is wholly good, yet I doubt if we have yet reached a new rule of simplicity. For an audience that really loved the drama, the sparse and austere realism of the French state theatres would serve every purpose; but the modern audience cares much for stagecraft and little for drama. No purely archæological reaction is likely to succeed. Salvation is not through abolishing the curtain and restoring the apron stage. Nor do some of the boldest new experiments seem to have the necessary universality. Gordon Craig's stage settings, based on simple geometrical repetitions, are the most worthy of attention in this class. He works with uniform series of massive rectangular columns, which may be set close or far, in pale or solid, simulating a grandiose architecture or merely forming a pattern to be artfully illuminated. The effects which he obtained upon his little model stage at Florence were delightful. They depended on right setting of the columns and upon lighting which shot the uniform pale buff of the columns with the most varied and charming complementary tones of blue or violet. Since then Mr. Craig has proved the entire practicability of what I may call the basaltic idea by thus mounting "Hamlet" at Moscow. I feel sure that he will continue to produce fine designs in this geometrical mode, as he did in his earlier mood of simplified realism. But the method seems to be too subjective for general application. It is, however, much in the air both in painting and stage setting. The Austrian and Hungarian managers work very much in Mr. Craig's fashion, but without his strenuous consistency and abstractness. The whole movement will at least impose a systematic and disciplinary principle of theatrical design.

Personally, I am surprised that the experiment has not been more frequently tried of giving the old poetical plays without specific setting. A mere back-cloth of verdure tapestry or the like has sufficed admirably for the play of "As You Like It." Other Shakespearean plays might require a few specific back-drops, the stage itself remaining frankly an architectural enclosure which becomes out-of-doors, or in, according to the clue afforded by the back-cloth. A modern audience of the sort that will go to Shakespeare at all would readily accommodate itself to such conventions. The settings should be made intrinsically handsome, but decorative rather than realistic. Once established in the classic repertory, it seems to me that the policy of a decorative simplicity would invade the modern field. Merely a reasonable economy would require the manager to use generalized decorative settings whenever he might, and specific and realistic settings only when he must. Such flexible opportunism would expedite performances and regain continuity of effect, would permit the giving of classic plays entire, would make for a freer modern dramaturgy, and relieve the pedantic oppression now imposed on the stage by the well-made play.

IV.

On theatrical reform through ideal managership, just a word. The idea of an omniscient régisseur remains permanently attractive—one who holds that unruly member, the player, in the hollow of his hand; one who is the ideal and reverential interpreter of dramatic masterpieces, the tireless overseer of the minutest details of action, declamation, lighting, decoration. Mr. Craig, who adds to the expansiveness of the creative artist much of the ruthlessness of the abstract logician, has long dallied with this notion of the ideal régisseur, eventually finding it bankrupt, for the good reason that the actual actor is often ignorant and almost always hopelessly insubordinate. There was a moment when Mr. Craig, despairing of the actor, had recourse to the puppet. The puppet is tractable, and, as for the declamatory part, any manager may hope to engage an accomplished and even docile reciter for the text. I think no one who saw the puppets in action on Mr. Craig's tiny stage found the idea ridiculous or their presence otherwise than piquant and charming. Indeed, aside from being mechanically controllable, puppets have distinct advantages over flesh-and-blood actors. All perspective illusions are possible with them. Mr. Craig could deploy an army upon a distant horizon and countermarch it in middle-distance before presenting the chieftain down stage. The whole dilemma of the middle-distance is readily solved by the puppet manager. I have touched on this clever experiment, first, because it reveals quite concretely the limitations of the ordinary stage picture, next because I feel that the puppet theatre contains unutilized possibilities. But despite the puppets, and their more formidable allies, the dancers, pantomimists, and figurants for the cinematograph, the theatre will be redeemed by the actor and the manager, or not at all. By a détour we are once more confronting the problem of the régisseur.

Common-sense clearly suggests that we must, while accepting broadly the conditions and limitations of stage-managership, endeavor to improve those conditions or make of those limitations sources of strength. The theatrical art necessarily deals not in absolutes and unities, but in happy compromises and approximations. Something of this relativity there is in all the arts, but it dominates peculiarly in those arts in which the creator is not sole performer and interpreter. To carry over from such unmediated arts as sculpture, painting, and poetry the requirement of a unified and absolutely original impression—to require this of such mediated arts as music and acted drama is an obvious solecism. And precisely the so-called infidelity of musician, actor, or conductor to the artist's original intention—an intention which is only matter of surmise after all—may result in illuminating the play or score from novel points of view, may legitimately enhance the masterpiece through sensitive and reverent interpretation. That the régisseur may recover power usurped by the actor, that stage-managership may increasingly assume the responsibilities of a fine art, we must devoutly hope.

V.

Reviewing broadly the new theatrical unrest, it seems valid, notwithstanding its aberrations, in its consistent antagonism to petty realism. It strikes at an admitted evil, and provides a remedy. But the final simplification of the stage is not likely to he achieved along Mr. Craig's lines of austere symbolism, nor yet by the more bizarre and decorative methods pursued in Austria-Hungary. A degree of naturalism the theatre can hardly dispense with. Excessive devotion to the dance and to pantomime are probably transient and merely incidental phases. The stage cannot long afford to repudiate or minimize the drama. On the contrary, reform is likely through a new entente between the stage and the drama. We need perhaps not exclusively the literary play, hut at least some literary plays, and, above all, liberation from the well-made piece cobbled together to match the passing whim of indolent and surfeited playgoers. Hauptmann, Rostand, Barrie, have been good risks even for modern managerdom. There is naturally money in appealing to the haser side of the playgoing puhlic; there is also money with self-respect in appealing to its better side. So far as the modern movement seeks emancipation from mere fuss and glitter, it is full of promise. It is likely to provide a stage stripped of trumpery and cleared for action. Such a stage, however, must overcome a stubborn predilection for mere gorgeousness. The brunt of the reform must he borne by a few far-seeing managers, and these must be supported by the friends of the new movement. Once tided over their beginnings, theatres thus organized should prosper. Freed from the burden of speculative salaries and costly mountings, the new-style régisseur would have distinct advantages. Very likely he would have imitators when the commercial managers realized the folly of competing with the cinematograph in naturalism, with the music hall in splendiferousness. Indeed, the present formidable rivalry of vaudeville and the moving-picture show may rather sternly direct the theatre towards its finer traditions as the very condition of survival.

Mr. Clayton Hamilton will hring out in January, through Holt, his "Studies in Stagecraft."

Johnston Forbes-Robertson played Othello for the first time in this country in the Shubert Theatre on Monday evening and acquitted himself of that difficult task with more success, perhaps, than was generally expected. His characterization, of course, was marked by intelligence rather than robustness. Even in the opening scenes his Othello savored of the court rather than the camp, exhibiting a suave and courteous dignity and to Brabantio a most tender and compassionate patience. In the oratorical passages, such as the address to the Senate, he was entirely satisfactory, although even here the absence of all suggestion of martial or rugged force was felt. He was most completely satisfactory, perhaps, in the scenes in Cyprus in the second act, when he showed picturesque qualities as the devoted lover of the fair Desdemona and as an energetic and efficient officer in time of broil and battle. His rebuke of Cassio was exceedingly effective. In the succeeding acts, as the victim of Iago's intrigue, he was extremely felicitous in marking the effects of the first gradual inroads of suspicion upon faith, but he failed in giving real tragic expression to the storms of jealous rage and despair which finally possessed him. In these great crises the physical effort was more eloquent than the emotional utterance. But the impersonation was in many respects a remarkable one and was especially interesting in its earliest and latest phases. Unfortunately his support was of very indifferent quality. The Iago, S. A. Cookson, in trying to be entirely natural became wholly dull and inefficient, and Gertrude Elliott played Desdemona without sympathy or insight. The stage management was excellent, but the general standard of the acting was low.

The name of Sydney Grundy's new play, which will soon be produced in London, is "World Without End." Fred. Kerr will produce the piece and sustain one of the leading parts in it, that of a judge whose experience of life has taught him to temper justice with mercy. Among other important characters in the picture are the governor of a jail and his wife, formerly a nurse, who has left at least one momentous incident in her past unrevealed to her husband.

Alan Campbell will begin his managerial venture at the London Globe with a four-act play called "The Night Hawk," by Lechmere Worral and Bernard Merivale—the latter a nephew of the author of "All for Her" and "The White Pilgrim."

The Incorporated Stage Society, of London, starts its fifteenth season with the production of a new four-act play, entitled "Change," by J. Q. Francis, a new dramatist. To the piece was last year awarded the prize of £100 offered by Lord Howard de Walden for the best original Welsh play by a Welsh writer.

"Mr. Wu," the new play at the London Strand Theatre, appears to be a pretty highly seasoned bit of melodrama. Mr. Wu is a Kowloon Mandarin, a blend of Oriental duplicity and ferocity and Oxford culture. When his beautiful young daughter falls a victim to the impetuous suit of Basil Gregory she disappears from public view. Then Basil also vanishes, and when his father threatens Wu with a revolver, he suddenly finds himself completely in the Chinaman's power. Wu then demands a private interview with Mrs. Gregory. He informs her that his daughter is dead, having paid the price of her shame, and that her son will soon be dead also, unless she, his mother, will sacrifice her own honor to save him. Mrs. Gregory tries to poison herself in a cup of tea, but Wu—who is as polite as he is relentless—insists upon drinking with her, and, having sipped, dies quickly in horrible convulsions.

Wilfred Sheridan writes as follows to the London Times:

In referring to an impending sale at Sotheby's, you wrote of the "original manuscript" of "The School for Scandal" as being among the items to be sold. I think it may interest the public to know that the original manuscript of "The School for Scandal" is at my home at Frampton Court, Dorchester. My grandfather, who was Sheridan's grandson, had this original MS. laid down and mounted with a specially printed text. There are, as I know, several stage copies in existence. One of them, in my possession, is annotated by Sheridan; possibly the one advertised may be something of this kind.

Stanley Houghton, a prominent young playwright, died last week at Manchester, England. "Hindle Wakes" and two short plays, "Fancy Free" and "The Younger Generation," by Mr. Houghton, have been given in this country. "Hindle Wakes," which was produced in New York on December 10, 1912, went upon the road a few weeks after its first appearance. In spite of its somewhat cold reception, it was recognized as a powerful piece of realism, and the young playwright was regarded as one who had a big future before him. The setting of the play was Lancashire, and the characters spoke a broad Lancashire dialect. "The Younger Generation" was produced at the Lyceum Theatre this season, with Grace George in the cast.

Twenty years have elapsed since Engelbert Humperdinck surprised the world with an entirely new kind of opera—a German fairy-tale amalgamated with the Wagnerian orchestra. At first thought this seemed a ludicrous mésalliance. As the authors of the guide to "Hänsel and Gretel" remark:

> The same method which Wagner devised as an accompaniment to the passions of Isolde and the woes of Brünnhilde is here employed to give musical utterance to the playfulness and the trifling griefs and fears of Hänsel and Gretel. The heroic side of the Valkyries is painted in colors no more brilliant than the broomstick ride of the Witch. The incongruity between means and end is glaring. Yet, wonder of wonders! the inconsistence made, it is forgotten in the all-pervading charm and sincerity of the work.

Inasmuch as this opera was an immediate success, its popularity spreading like wild-fire all over Europe, it should seem as if a guide to its beauties were superfluous. Yet, while the opera makes an immediate appeal to everybody by its emotional melody, it contains a wealth of detail that escapes the casual listener; and it is to call attention to these subtle merits that the guide was written. The story is told in full, the leading motives, twenty-six in all, are given in musical type, and the ingenious use made of them is fully explained. Special emphasis is placed on a misunderstanding which in some minds has prevented Humperdinck from getting all the credit due him. His occasional use of a borrowed folk-song has misled these persons into the belief that none of the music is wholly original. The four folk-songs used by him are named in the guide. It is altogether an excellent little book, which should find its place on the shelf next to the guide to Humperdinck's "Königskinder," by the same writers.

Filson Young's collection of opera stories includes "Hänsel and Gretel." The other operas in it are "Faust," "Carmen," "The Magic Flute," "Don Giovanni," "Aïda" "Madama Butterfly," "The Bohemians," "Cavalleria Rusticana," and "I Pagliacci." The writer's method consists in telling the plots of the operas as short stories without reference to the acts and scenes in the opera—a method which has its advantages. Ethel Schubert, on the other hand, follows the usual way of telling the plot, step by step. The forty-six operas chosen by her are those usually sung now at American opera houses or exploited on the singing machines. The composers are arranged alphabetically, and a few biographical facts precede the description of each one's operas, or opera; for of the twenty-four composers included, no fewer than fifteen are represented by only one opera. Of Massenet's, two are given. The omission of "Manon" is explained as being due to the fact that "Puccini's opera, 'Manon Lescaut,' tells the same story as Massenet's, and is now more frequently sung"—which is not true. Of Wagner's operas, ten are included.

Oliver Huckel has his own way of Englishing Wagner's operatic poems, putting the stage directions into blank verse, together with the poetic lines. That his way has its admirers may be inferred from the fact that his "Tristan and Isolde" is the ninth of Wagner's operas thus treated by him. Mr. Huckel looks on this poem as the high-water mark of Wagner's genius. His book is printed in black-letter type, with red heads, and half a dozen full-page illustrations or scenes in the opera.

That Wagner wrote, besides a dozen operas, the same number of volumes of prose works, not to speak of his letters, which make another dozen or so, is well known. The most important of his treatises on music is "Opera and Drama." Of this there are now two good English translations—one by W. Ashton Ellis, and another and better one by Edwin Evans, sr., a splendid specimen of the translator's art, which even those will do well to consult who can read the original; for Wagner's treatise, as printed in German, is "one unbroken sea of prose-matter." Besides doing this into idiomatic English, Mr. Evans has provided chapter headings, section and subsection headings, as well as subdivision of paragraphs, with numbers and separate titles for each, thus making it a much more helpful book than the original. The table of contents takes up twenty-one pages and serves not only as a guide, but an appetizer; with its aid any one can in a moment satisfy his curiosity as to Wagner's opinions on the relation of music to poetry; the aria as springing from folksong; the ballet as springing from the folk-dance; limitation of the poet's means of expression; Mozart and Mendelssohn compared; Rossini's bid for popularity; the chagrin of Rossini at Meyerbeer's success; omnipotence of melody; religious music as operatic material; Beethoven's great inspiration; Beethoven's mistake; degradation of modern opera; terminal rhyme and conversational speech; the womanly relation of the tonal language to dramatic art; and a hundred other topics.

The latest biography of Wagner is by John F. Runciman. The peppery London critic evidently does not like "Parsifal," but for the other works of Wagner he has the utmost admiration. Even in the "Flying Dutchman" he finds "pages which Wagner never afterwards surpassed." Wagner's first wife "ought to have married a pork-butcher." His opinion of Wagner's character is summed up in these words: "He was one of the noblest, most generous men that have lived. There is not a mean trait in his character."

Ernest Newman confesses that he has treated Wagner's love affairs in detail in his forthcoming life of that composer, which will be his third book on Wagner.

"Richard Strauss," writes a correspondent, is a well-nigh all-convincing apostle for his own music, and after conducting with splendid success a number of his works in Karlsruhe recently, he went over to Vienna, where, at the head of the Tonkünstler Orchestra, he gave a concert which must have made him realize how firm his hold has become in the Austrian capital on a large contingent of the musical community. He gave a stirring interpretation to his latest opus, the Festival Prelude, written for the opening, a few weeks since, of the new Concerthaus, which originally had been heard in a far less authoritative and impressive manner.

Art

Mr. H. Inigo Triggs, whose works "Formal Gardens in England and Scotland" and "The Art of Garden Design in Italy" are well known, now publishes a book on "Garden Craft in Europe" (Scribner), which treats the development of design from early times to the rise of the English Landscape School. The illustrations—largely from such old records as paintings and illuminated manuscripts, or the less ancient sources of the collections of engravings—show the famous gardens of Europe as they were, or as they were designed to be, before they were overlaid with more or less incongruous subsequent additions and changes. Of the design of the present day the book says little, because, the reader is led to suspect, Mr. Triggs does not find much good modern design that is not merely an echo of former work. This may fairly be said of modern Italian work and of much French work, but modern English design is quite as good as the average work of the same scale at any previous time.

For the sake of the completeness of the general survey, Mr. Triggs's book goes over what little we know about ancient gardens in Europe and the gardens of the Middle Ages. Except for some excellent illustrations from old breviaries and similar sources, however, he brings little new contribution to the subject. German and Austrian gardens, which are treated briefly, are of course of little value to the lover of garden beauty. They are apt to be copies either of English or of French styles, and are not nearly so well conceived as their prototypes. On garden design in the Netherlands, however, Mr. Triggs has much that is interesting to say. The painstaking, rather uninspired style of the low countries, fanciful sometimes to grotesqueness, but always with a feeling of homely usefulness and practicality, is well set forth by the illustrations, most of which will be new to the ordinary reader. Of the Spanish gardens, too, there are excellent illustrations, with original plans of the Generaliffe and the Alcazar. Good pictures of Spanish garden design are for some reason rather rare, and these are therefore the more valuable. This book gives a more general view of the whole field of garden design in Europe than is found in any other one volume. The illustrations are excellent, some of them are new. The text is a running description of the places illustrated, not attempting the difficult task of differentiating styles of design or tracing their changes to their sociologic causes.

Dr. Anton Hekler's quarto volume on "Greek and Roman Portraits" (Putnam) contains in its 311 good "half-tone" plates an admirable selection of the chief examples of portraiture which have come down to us. On the last two plates the illustrations are from coins, the rest are from marble statues and busts; and nearly every important museum in Europe, and not a few private collections, have furnished their quota. In this country the museum in Boston has afforded illustrations for nine plates, two each being given to the so-called Menander there, to the fine head of Augustus, and to the extraordinary terra-cotta head of an aristocratic Roman—a portrait that recalls in a startling manner the older generation of Boston's citizens. Those who know the fine examples of portraiture which have been acquired in the last few years by the Metropolitan Museum in New York will regret that a selection from these could not have found a place in the volume. The book is provided with an admirable "List of Illustrations," which includes for each portrait the bibliography that is essential, and tells what parts are restored. There is also an "Index of Places," with references to the catalogue numbers of the several museums, and a list of the most important works on antique portraits.

An introduction of 42 pages precedes the portraits, and furnishes a guide to the student in using them. This part also of the book shows the author to be well acquainted with the material of his subject, and reasonable and cautious in his attribution of the portraits to individuals. But the discussion is marred by a subjective sort of art criticism, too common in Germany, by more or less verbiage, and sometimes by a curious use of words (e. g., "brazen" for bronze, "enframed in" for framed in, "selfless" for unselfish, "importunate," page 21, apparently for inopportune, etc.). We quote a few rather typical remarks: "The face is no longer the wonderful instrument on which all the spiritual faculties may sound their harmonies"; the Greek method of representation insisted "on the dynamics of spiritual life"; "Greek art essayed in particular to deal with the physiognomical problem which arises from the conflict between the strenuous, steadfast human intellect and an erratic, meteoric natural talent"; "we are conscious," in looking at a portrait of Cæsar, "of a tragic presentiment which veils the face like a thin autumn mist shrouding a heroic landscape." We may doubt also whether "crude realism" is a good term to apply to Ionic art, and whether Euripides really is the "greatest of Attic poets." In the spelling of proper names there is considerable inconsistency: Aristotle appears as Aristoteles; Alexander has the English form, though Menandros has not; in general k is not transliterated by c, yet Sicyonian and Anticythera occur. In spite, however, of some marked defects in the introductory essay, it rests on much careful and thorough study, and this essential excellence will overbalance many faults of detail.

"Personal Recollections of Vincent van Gogh (Houghton Mifflin), by Elizabeth du Quesne van Gogh, is, as its title implies, an intimate memorial. One gets the softened but sufficiently clear picture of a fine mind prematurely consumed by its own unreasonable energies. The moody lad, incapable in practical concerns, spasmodically the evangelist and the artist, early suffered a mental breakdown through overstudy. A perilous emotional tension is in all his painting, as well in that produced in lucid intervals as in that coming from the asylum at Arles. Through needlessly offending his kinsman, Mauve, Van Gogh threw away the chance of an education in his art. Native affinity drew him to Claude Bernard and Gauguin, luminists and extreme individualists. Without adequate knowledge of form or respect for the tradition of painting, he blundered strenuously along the lines laid down by Cézanne. Maximum color and establishment of his forms by color alone were his aims. The blare of his color and the potent distortion of his strokes suited his anguished emotion. His case is one in pathological æsthetics. His note is keen, individual, distinguished, but his ecstasy is that of delirium. The tortured contours and strident colors of his flower pieces have every mark of perilous hyperæsthesia. His sister's Recollections, though the notorious tragic incidents of Van Gogh's career are suppressed or merely suggested, help one to understand the man. For him personally nothing but a profound compassion is in order; for his art, steadfastly responsive to the exaltation of his mood, admiration is due. Certain rarely explored corners of emotional experience he has revealed with power and with complete sincerity. But the artistic aberration that makes a leader of Van Gogh deserves the severest condemnation. Successful revolutions in art are not led by half-trained mad men, even when they happen to be geniuses. The distortions and exaggerations which were a morbid but perfectly sincere expression of Van Gogh's personality, are meaningless and disgusting when coldly adopted by his imitators. His art is very special, intense, and limited. It is very appealing, but one should yield to the appeal with a full sense that this art is abnormal and eccentric; a pitiful tragic flower, unique and without power of reproduction. For the Post-Impressionist view of the matter the reader may be referred to a brief preface by A. B. Davies and a critical introduction by Katherine S. Dreier, who is also the translator. Her plea gains no force from spelling Cézanne with an s and Giorgione with three i's—or is this a rebuke to prevailing oppressive literalism? The publishers have made the book attractive with orange boards as cover and many illustrations.

Hermann Faber, an artist and etcher, who was known for his etchings of animals and illustrations for standard medical works, died last week at his home, in Germantown, Pa. He was eighty-one years old. During the Civil War he served as artist on the Surgeon-General's staff of the United States army, under Gens. Barnes and Woodward. He also illustrated the United States medical record of the war. Mr. Faber was born in Germany, and came to this country in 1854.

THE NEW HAVEN RAILWAY'S DIVIDEND.

On Wednesday of last week, the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railway Company, which had paid dividends uninterruptedly since its organization in 1872, and which, as lately as last year, paid 8 per cent. per annum, passed its quarterly dividend. The action was taken by the new management which was placed in charge of the property when Mr. Mellen, as a result of the long campaign against the alleged extravagances of his régime, gave up the presidency. In Wall Street, the news created a profound impression; it has been reflected, not only by a violent break in New Haven's shares, but by declines in the great majority of other railways.

The suspension of the dividend would have been an incident of comparatively slight importance in the finances of most other railways, but, with a company whose stock has for forty years been the refuge of New England's thrift, the natural reliance of bequeathed estates and little savings, it was a very personal calamity. Much has been said, by way of moralizing over the event, and most of it was beside the point. People who ascribe all mishaps of railway finance to Government regulation have been telling the public how the rate restriction caused the New Haven's troubles. People who cannot conceive of any financial calamity without some thieving capitalist as the cause of it have been calling for vengeance on the robbers of the company. Neither has grasped the meaning of the episode.

As a matter of financial history, the present New Haven situation is a mournful landmark of the financial ideas and theories which gained such extraordinary vogue in 1901. Sober-minded people, who think that half the world is mad to-day, with its New Ideas in social and political philosophy—its "feminism," its "eugenics," its courses in public schools on "white slavery" and "sex hygiene," its "direct legislation," its "recall of judicial decisions"—ought once in a while to remember that the high finance of a dozen years ago was quite as mad, and with very similiar delusions. Where our social philosophers of to-day would have us make over human nature for the purpose of their experiments, our financial philosophers of a decade ago would have had us abolish the old rules of credit, of trade, of business prudence, and of intrinsic values.

Both of them looked with supreme contempt on the teachings of experience. Just as the delusions of 1913 base themselves on the principle that to make a community well behaved you should discard all conventionalities and loosen all restraint on conduct, so the delusions of 1901 were pivoted on the theory that the way to make a man or a corporation rich and prosperous was to throw to the winds the old-fashioned maxims of financial prudence, and increase his debts indefinitely. Few companies fell more notoriously under the scope of this experiment than the unfortunate New Haven.

The promoters of that theory seemed to imagine that the way to end the inconveniences of competition was to buy up every competitor at any price he asked. If his enterprise was a worthless one, pay him what a prosperous company was worth; if it was a going concern, pay him the price of a Golconda mine. Load your own company with mortgage debt to do it, and trust to luck for the outcome. The New Haven Company was made to buy up trolley lines at the trolley promoter's figure, and connecting railways at whatever price was set by the astonished seller—all this with the absolute certainty before the eyes of the New Haven management that none of the companies combined through this wild extravagance could ask any more for its transportation services than before. The end of such a policy was foreshadowed from the day when it was adopted. With an enterprise less soundly bulwarked by previous conservatism and natural advantages than the New Haven was, it would have come long before it did.

Considered in the light of that perfectly well-known period of American finance, it is pretty safe to say that nothing will be gained to-day by railing at "Government restriction" or by starting on the trail of the Money Devil. What is necessary for the New Haven is that which has already been done with many other corporate victims of the hallucinations of that period—the undoing, as soon as prudent foresight will permit, of the mischief which this decade inherited from the decade before it, and the reversion to the principles of sound finance and sober common-sense. This is the path which the New Haven's new management is taking. Contrary to a very prevalent view in Wall Street, the task is not one of destruction, but of reconstruction, with a view to a happier future.

JOHN BROWN: A BIOGRAPHY FIFTY YEARS AFTER

By OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Some Tributes to this Remarkable Historical Work

Philadelphia PUBLIC LEDGER. "A tremendous book; more thrilling than any book of fiction, powerful in its appeal, and which, while it is written soberly, as befits history, by the very nature of the narrative, often rises to the highest dramatic level."

THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON. "I can only say after reading from first to last its more than 700 pages that I have never encountered anything this side of Gibbon's 'Rome' which has made me feel more the personal power of a single work."

JOHN T. MORSE, Editor American Statesmen Series, in ATLANTIC MONTHLY. "Perhaps in thus dramatically fashioning his volume, Mr. Villard obeyed an instinct rather than acted upon a preconceived plan; that is often the case with great work, where a writer's feelings are deeply enlisted. Be this as it may, the merit and charm are none the less; he has seized well a splendid opportunity and has written one of the great biographies of our literature."

HORACE WHITE. "In my judgment a contribution to American literature to take rank with the very best historical writing of our time or any time. The only impartial history of the Kansas war."

ST. CLAIR McKELWAY in the Brooklyn EAGLE. "A biography replete with facts and marked by courage and candor, learning and justice."

Portland OREGONIAN. "The most valuable and comprehensive biography issued this season, and the best and most candid estimate of John Brown."

W. E. CONNELLEY in the TOPEKA CAPITAL. "The unprejudiced student and seeker for truth will herald the book as a great contribution to American history."

Des Moines CAPITAL. "More powerful in its appeal, more dramatic than any book of fiction, is this wonderful biography of John Brown."

The NORTH CAROLINA REVIEW. "In this biography Mr. Villard has touched high-water mark. The book is a delight to the reader for many reasons. Full of life and movement, . . . written in an attractive and scholarly style, full of sympathy and yet without any loss in accurate presentation, it sets a new standard for biographical efforts."

Baltimore AMERICAN. "While the book has popular features in that it is entrancingly interesting, its scholarship is of the highest order and its style reminds one a little of Anthony Froude. . . . Mr. Villard has illustrated in this book the finest ideals of literary conception and execution."

London TIMES. "It is scarcely likely that any later writer will be able either to add anything of importance to Mr. Villard's collection of material or to better his interpretation of the whole story. . . . It at once becomes the standard, and probably the final authority on its theme."

Washington (D. C.) STAR. "Mr. Villard draws a compact, vivid, historic picture of the terrible focussing of this period upon our Civil War. Straight and clear in its literary way, this biography is a marvel of research and fair-mindedness."

HENRY WATTERSON in Louisville COURIER-JOURNAL. "No fault may justly be found with Mr. Villard's telling of the story. It is minute and lucid, altogether fair and unvarnished."

Burlington (Iowa) HAWKEYE. "It is a book which will take a place in the library of every well established home in this part of the country."

TO WHICH ARE NOW FIRST ADDED HIS

Western Letters and Journals

Edited, with an Introduction and Notes,

By JOHN H. WILLIAMS

Author of "The Mountain That Was 'God,'" "The Guardians of the Columbia," etc.

Royal 8vo, 500 pages, with 16 plates in color, 64 halftones, and 60 other illustrations, showing the great scenery of the Northwest, reproductions of celebrated historical pictures, Indians and Indian Life, portraits, etc., etc.

Bound in ½ vellum (leather), with silk cloth sides, gilt tops and boxed.

Price $5.00 net; express 30 cents extra.

Winthrop's fascinating romance of travel remains our most vital picture of conditions in Washington and Oregon during the territorial period, sixty years ago. The value of his book, for all who are interested in Western history and adventure, has been doubled by the addition of his letters and diaries, which cover his entire stay on the Pacific Coast, beginning at San Francisco early in 1853, and closing with his overland trip East, via Salt Lake City in October.

LONDON IN ENGLISH LITERATURE

By PERCY HOLMES BOYNTON, Assistant Professor of English Literature in the University of Chicago.

This volume differs from all other volumes on London in that it gives a consecutive illustrated account of London not from the point of view of the antiquarian but from that of the inquiring student of English literary history.

It deals with ten consecutive periods, characterized in turn by the work and spirit of Chaucer, Shakespeare, Milton, Dryden, Addison, Johnson, Lamb, Dickens, and by the qualities of Victorian and contemporary London. The emphasis is thus distributed over history and given largely to the richer and more recent literary periods. The temper of each epoch is discussed, and then in particular those literary works which are intimately related to certain localities in London.

The work contains four maps and forty-three other illustrations, selected from the best of a great fund of material.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, DECEMBER 25, 1913.

The Week

Between Mr. Mann, Republican leader in the House of Representatives, and Speaker Clark, who took the floor to reply to his "calamity" talk the other day, honors are even. Mr. Mann draws a harrowing picture of poverty and unemployment in Chicago, and declares that "the President and the other side of the House," instead of doing something to relieve the situation, are pursuing the "fatuous policy that they talked about on the stump." Mr. Clark, then rising to reply, makes one point which, it must be admitted, is highly effective. Mr. Mann had pointed to the soup-houses and bread-lines brought in by the calamity of Democratic rule, and had declared that nothing of the kind was known in the panic year of 1907; whereupon Mr. Clark neatly counters as follows:

> The gentleman says there were no soup-houses in 1907. In that year I made a speech here, and quoted a whole lot of this kind of stuff which he has been quoting here to-day. Republican soup-houses was my theme on that occasion.

This candid reference to his own buncombe of the past is well enough as a reply to Mr. Mann's buncombe of the present; but why introduce a fresh bit of buncombe by throwing out dark suspicions that the present depression, or the talk about it, is part of a Republican conspiracy to destroy the country's prosperity?

> Frank G. Allen, plough manufacturer of Moline, Ill., is to be the standard-bearer of the new Progressive party for United States Senator in the campaign of 1914. This was decided to-day at the State conference of the Moose men.

But how can a mere conference, even though it be composed of the wisest men in the party, decide upon a nominee for office? What are primaries for? At the very time when these Illinois leaders of the Progressives were acting like reactionaries, the Progressives in the House of Representatives at Washington were calling attention to "the fact that reform of the National Convention does not touch the fundamental difference between the Progressive and Republican parties, and that in all probability Presidential candidates hereafter will be nominated, not by conventions, but by a direct vote of the people." Isn't what is good enough for a Presidential candidate good enough for one who is running for the Senate? Yet we read that in Ohio, too, the Progressives are to hold a conference early in January "to take steps to put a complete ticket in the field in the campaign for State offices next November."

Few thought that President Wilson might veto the Hetch-Hetchy bill. When it passed both houses of Congress by emphatic majorities, its becoming a law was generally taken for granted. In signing the bill, which he says he examined with care, Mr. Wilson gives a statement of his reasons for approval. These may be strong enough to have prevented him from exercising the veto power, and we raise no doubt of his having done what he sincerely thought to be his duty. A President does well to hesitate and be sure of his ground before setting up his judgment against the deliberate vote of Congress. But an argument for not vetoing the bill after it is passed is one thing, and the argument against voting for the bill while it was pending is quite another. The latter is the argument which the champions of the integrity of the national parks urged, and they need not now withdraw anything they have said. President Wilson, without naming him, plainly alludes to Mr. Gifford Pinchot as one of the great advocates of conservation who have yet favored the Hetch-Hetchy invasion of the Yosemite. But this only shows how careful a man like Mr. Pinchot ought to be, lest his deserved authority be misused. And in this particular case it has been more than intimated that Mr. Pinchot was willing to give up Hetch-Hetchy in order to induce San Franciscans to be more favorable to the general policy of conservation.

The dissolution of the great telegraph and telephone combination presents three points of cardinal interest. In the first place, it is conclusive evidence that the feat can be done—a thing that has been denied over and over in regard to cases of similar nature. This conclusion is distinctly emphasized by the fact that the dissolution was effected by friendly understanding between the company and the Attorney-General; for in order to satisfy Mr. McReynolds as he has been satisfied, it may be assumed that the practical effectiveness of the scheme of dissolution was fully made out to his mind. In the second place, it is impossible to look upon the latest development in the series of great merger-dissolutions otherwise than as a link in the chain of legitimate consequences of the memorable decisions of the Supreme Court, during Mr. Taft's Administration, in the Standard Oil and Tobacco Trust cases. And finally, as an indication of the immediate temper of the time, the affair has very much the look of a manifestation of desire on the part of the Wilson Administration for peace and not turmoil between Government and business.

Two alternatives are suggested in the annual report of the Interstate Commerce Commission for the "persistence" of train accidents, "leading always to the same harrowing results." Either "a great majority of these deplorable railway disasters are unavoidable, or there exists a widespread lack of intelligent and well-directed effort to minimize the mistakes of employees in the operation of trains." For, the report says squarely, "All of the mistakes noted above are violations of simple rules, which should have been easily understood by men of sufficient intelligence to be entrusted with the operation of trains." The Commission goes even further. "The evidence is that in the main the rules are understood" (our italics). But in many cases "operating officers are cognizant of this habitual disregard of rules, and no proper steps are taken to correct the evil." Has the Commission ever heard of one James O. Fagan and of his showing up of the attitude of labor unions towards attempts by railway managers to enforce discipline? Does the Commission know that one great railway was recently threatened with a strike because it proposed to take "proper steps to correct the evil" of avoidable accidents?

A country proud of such achievements as Col. Gorgas's ought to be sensitive to the charge made by Professor Sedgwick, of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, that most of our city and State health boards are "incompetent and inefficient." His speech echoes opinions expressed at the recent dedication of the medical buildings of the University of Nebraska. Speaking there for the West, as Professor Sedgwick has just spoken for the East, one scientist remarked that "trained experts are nowhere more seriously needed and unfortunately more difficult to secure than in the field of public health." Professor Sedgwick reminded the cities that they did not spend time or money enough on experts in bacteriology, municipal hygiene, and sanitary engineering. Professor Ward asserted that the State and other universities did not make adequate provision for training such experts. But both pointed to the same need. If the cities and States wake up to demand trained men, the laboratories will turn them out.

The Boston grand jury, which has reported that it had not found sufficient evidence to warrant the indictment of any one for responsibility for the deaths of twenty-eight men in the recent lodging-house fire there, makes another statement of a kind that occurs with almost monotonous regularity in the story of such calamities. The insufficiency of the fire escapes had not missed the attention of the inspectors of the Building Department, and an order had been issued to the owner, six weeks before the disaster, to supply additional means of escape in case of fire; but nothing had been done about it. It is often stated that there is not a sufficient number of inspectors in our cities; but the trouble lies deeper. One inspector, under a system in which strict and stern enforcement of orders prevails, is more to the purpose than five inspectors with a lax execution of the law.

To discussion of the many-sided problem of education in the South a proposal for compulsory education in Virginia has made a contribution of great, if indirect, encouragement to workers against child labor. Of the 600,000 children in Virginia, only 400,000 ever see the inside of a public schoolroom. Those who defend the present district-option system of passing on enforced schooling base their arguments on the higher taxes involved in a change; the root of the matter being the inveterate prejudice against compulsory education of the negro. It is highly encouraging to find papers like the Richmond Virginian defending the proposal. Deducting from the 200,000 the children in private schools and those above fourteen, the Virginian estimates that only the cost of educating 60,000 would be added to the present burden of the schools, and asks if that is too great to be assumed at once. The child-labor law in Virginia fixes the age limit at fourteen, and not at twelve, as in most Southern States, and the palpable evils resulting from idleness are behind the agitation. If to the children of a State is given leisure to study, facilities must follow.

Sixteen years of experience with the indeterminate-sentence law in Indiana show, according to the Board of Charities of that State, that of every hundred prisoners paroled, fifty-seven do as they agree and are discharged from supervision, twenty-six violate their parole, the sentences of six expire during the parole period, so that they are automatically discharged, two die, and the remaining nine are under supervision at a given time, "reporting" regularly. An interesting portion of the statement is that dealing with the financial aspect of the system. The earnings of these prisoners during the time they "reported" totalled more than $2,000,000. Their expenses amounted to $1,700,000. Hence, instead of costing the State $172 a year each, as does the average prisoner, these paroled men and women made their way and had savings of about $50 each. It is pointed out that "indeterminate" is a somewhat misleading designation, as the sentences served must fall between the minimum and the maximum terms prescribed by statute for the crime committed. The parole boards at the various institutions have wide latitude both in granting pardons and in withdrawing the liberty of persons on parole.

Mrs. Inez Milholland Boissevain and Mrs. Alva E. Belmont, by their interposition in support of the "white slave" moving-picture films in this city, are helping to identify the cause of woman suffrage with the advocacy of exhibitions of that character. Qualify it as they will, their attitude will be taken by sober people, and, we believe, will be justly taken, as indicating a desire for the undiscriminating exploitation, before general audiences, of subjects the handling of which in that manner is full of danger. The presumption that this mischief vastly outweighs any good that may be accomplished is so strong that the most weighty and convincing evidence is required to overthrow it. Certainly no one will regard Mrs. Belmont's ipsa dixit as constituting such evidence. That she thinks the drawing of miscellaneous crowds to such an exhibition as the police have been endeavoring to suppress a "mighty service" of which "future generations will reap the benefit" will be held perhaps to throw fresh light on the quality of her reasoning powers.

"Agitation," we read, "for celebrating the tercentenary of the Pilgrims' landing, and for a world's fair, began in 1909. It was felt that unless something was done to inform the world of New England's claim upon the year 1920 some other community might preëmpt the date." In this is tacit admission of the hampering multiplicity of international expositions. If Panama were to profit by Yankee shrewdness, she might soon proclaim that in 2214 will be held a fair celebrating the tercentenary of the Canal's completion. The case parallels the hurried announcement of the scholar that he has selected a certain spot in the domain of knowledge for a book, and warns all others off. But is it not possible that Plymouth's ambition overleaps itself? Of late, there has been a tendency to deny the necessity of world-wide participation in all world's fairs; from which we might assume the possibility of two existing simultaneously—perhaps not side by side, but in different hemispheres.

The recall has been invoked in Orangeburg, S. C., against the Mayor and a Councilman, who are charged with being "temperamentally unfit" for their positions. This is an illuminating commentary upon the assurance which advocates of this device often give us, that the recall will be resorted to only in cases of real importance. If the present attempt in Orangeburg fails, why not start another petition for a recall election, upon the ground that the clothes of the Mayor and the Councilman in question are not of a suitable color or cut for occupants of the offices they hold? Perhaps Orangeburg is democratic enough to entertain a petition setting forth that these officials part their hair in the middle, or are a bit fussy about their ties. The Columbia State, while having its doubts about the desirability of making temperamental fitness an issue, reconciles itself to this election by the consideration that it may call the attention of the people of South Carolina to the existence of the recall as an essential part of the commission plan of government. Unless the recall is occasionally resorted to its value will deteriorate. This is, indeed, a point that must not be overlooked. Why not insure attention to it by providing that if no one voluntarily invokes the recall, it shall be the duty of the Corporation Counsel to do so at least as often as every third year?

Huerta's generals have taken a leaf out of the book of Pancho Villa, by enlisting the services of a press agent. The Constitutionalist commander has always given notice of his strategic moves several days ahead. It is true that he has usually followed up his advance notice by attacking in quite a different place from the one designated and in a manner not at all outlined in his "release" copy. This is poor newspaper ethics. The efficacy of the method is undeniable, however, and is acknowledged by the other side. Thus, in response to Villa's explicit statement of his plans with regard to the advance from Chihuahua on Mexico City, comes a detailed strategic plan from Gen. Mercado, in command of the forces which recently evacuated Chihuahua with extraordinary celerity. Mercado now announces that he will immediately proceed to retake Juarez and Chihuahua, and by interposing himself between the rebels and their base of supplies sound the death-knell of the revolution. Whether an army that felt itself too weak to hold a fortified city against the enemy is now strong enough to retake that city, together with other cities designated, is open to question. It would need a first-class press agent to make the thing seem probable.

The "heroism" of Lieut. Forstner, who struck a lame cobbler of Alsace over the head with his sabre, has been rewarded with a sentence of forty-three days' imprisonment. This is the minimum penalty provided for such offences. As evidence at the court-marial proved the Lieutenant's allegation untenable that he had drawn his weapon in self-defence, it had no choice but to find him guilty. The outcome of the trial must be satisfying to the outraged population of the disaffected provinces. It indicates the willingness of the higher officers in the German army to do the honorable thing. Had the offence committed by the Lieutenant been a really grave one, had he killed the cobbler and followed this up by slaughtering a few bystanders, doubtless the penalty would have been something more than the minimum imposed. But with the necessity of keeping the rabble in a proper attitude towards their superiors, so that the latter will not be under the painful necessity of rebuking "wild game" now and then, even the Alsatians must see that it would not do to be too hard upon a high-spirited young officer.

The difficulty of stamping out the duel in Germany is made plain by a recent occurrence in the army. It seems that a first lieutenant in one of the crack Guard regiments was retired a couple of years ago on the ground that he was unfitted for a military career by reason of the lack of the "power of decision" necessary in a military officer. The facts in the case have now been made public as follows: This officer notified his superior officers that because of conscientious scruples he could not subscribe to the doctrine of the duel. He was besought by a group of officers to change his mind. He yielded to them sufficiently to withdraw his protest, but the next morning his religious convictions resumed their sway, and he again notified the authorities that he stood by his position. They promptly retired him for indecision of character, which they carefully explained had nothing to do with his attitude towards duelling. They maintained that a man who could change his mind twice in twenty-four hours had not the force needed to make decisions in military emergencies. The case has attracted a great deal of attention in Berlin, and is likely to be discussed in the Reichstag.

Cardinal Rampolla's retirement from the office of Papal Secretary, just ten years ago, may have been partly out of disappointment at his failure to be chosen as successor to Leo XIII. But since Rampolla's election had been prevented by the veto of Austria, which presumably was well-inclined to the choice of Cardinal Sarto, it would have been difficult for Rampolla to carry on the Papal foreign policy under the new Pontiff. The Cardinal's sympathies were with the Western Powers as against the Triple Alliance. Under his successor, Merry del Val, the controversy between the Vatican and France, for some time under way, was sharply accentuated, and resulted, within two years, in the enactment of the Separation law, the after effects of which are still visible in French political life. In Spain and Portugal, too, the Vatican has suffered reverses more or less severe since the passing of Cardinal Rampolla from power. In his failure to reach the Papal throne were once more exemplified the dangers that beset a personality strong enough to make enemies and not strong enough to ride down all opposition.

It now seems certain that it is the intention of President Yuan Shi-Kai to dissolve the Parliament at Peking. The step may be regarded as only a temporary setback to the cause of representative government in China. It is a form of reaction which other nations have witnessed and which would seem to be almost inevitable in the evolution of parliamentary institutions. For Yuan Shi-Kai, facing the obstruction of the representatives from the southern provinces, the move may be of immediate expediency. But it is also one fraught with danger. The revolutionists of the South have been furnished with an excuse for another uprising. The hatred between the North and the South is a permanent factor on which those who oppose the rule of Peking can count. Sun Yat-Sen, the head of the recent uprising in the South, has made it plain that the struggle will be carried on. Under China's loose system of provincial government and in the absence of a formidable standing army, there will always be local centres of discontent, and, when the opportunity offers, insurrection. Instead of attempting the extremely difficult task of allaying the historic enmity between the Chinese of the North and the South, Yuan Shi-Kai has preferred to put in force repression.

THE BANKING AND CURRENCY LAW.

The cloud of dust with which partisan or professional misrepresentation had so long surrounded the Banking and Currency bill has suddenly blown away, and the public recognizes the measure for what it actually is—one of the most remarkable achievements in sound constructive legislation of our time. We do not so characterize it merely for the purpose of echoing the belated enthusiasm of those critics who, until the passage of the law had become inevitable, refused to perceive anything of the good that was in the bill. Still less do we dispute the assertion—the last stand of the purely destructive critics—that cordial approval of the act has been made possible largely through the amendments of the past two weeks. On the contrary, we wish to-day to express our own emphatic judgment that the result is most remarkable, for the very reason that the effort at currency reform began under such weighty handicaps, and that sober and statesmanlike deliberation has swept them so effectively away.

About every great fiscal measure of the past half-century, in this country, has been made up of a bundle of compromises with the faction of unsound finance. The Specie Resumption Act was a notable instance of the process; the Silver Purchase Act was chiefly a surrender to such influences; the Gold Standard Act of 1900 was enacted only after reiterating the legal-tender proviso for Government paper money. That the present law goes to the statute books without a single compromise of this sort, on any vital part of the working machinery of the bill, is therefore a most exceptional result. That it should have been the work of the party which, barely a dozen years ago, was captured by Populistic leaders and committed to depreciated money—by a party in whose deliberations, during the six months' Congressional debate upon the bill, the theories of inflation have repeatedly found angry and defiant assertion—makes the issue at least a landmark in the history of American politics.

No one is likely to deny that the credit for this achievement lies in great degree with President Wilson, to whose firmness, persistency, and unfailing tact has been largely due the defeat of ignorant and factious opposition within the party. Mr. Wilson's prestige must in justice be divided with the Chairman of the House Committee, Mr. Carter Glass, whose thorough knowledge of the subject, obstinate refusal to yield to the fads and fancies urged by influential public men, and constant readiness to accept intelligent criticism of his bill by the banking community, kept the true ideal of the proposed legislation unswervingly before Congress and the people. Only with Tuesday's publication of the text of the new measure did those critics who still withheld approval, because the Senate amendments had dispensed entirely with requirements of an actual cash reserve in vaults of individual banks, learn that Mr. Glass forced the conference committee to restore that safeguard. By no means least of all, credit for the practical machinery of the measure belongs to ex-Senator Aldrich, the general theory and framework of whose own plan for banking reform—patiently and, in our judgment, patriotically shaped by its author during a long examination of the subject—have been incorporated in the act.

There are sections of the law which are copied nearly verbatim from the Aldrich bill; and the reason is that the wording and purport of those sections could not be improved on. But the act is none the less distinctly superior to the Aldrich plan—not only because it has successfully avoided that plan's politically impossible expedient of a single central bank controlled by private banking interests, but because certain grave and positive evils in the Aldrich bill have been removed. The present act compels no one to accept the notes except the Government; in this it stands with the National Bank Act. The Aldrich bill, like the Silver Purchase Act of 1890, forced their acceptance for all, except the exclusively gold payments, by the Government—a long step towards legal tender. The Aldrich bill would have made the new notes, at once and under all circumstances, lawful money for use in bank reserves; the conference committee on the present act rejected even the Senate's proposal for a tentative and discretionary use of the notes for such purposes.

We have said, in commenting on the conference amendments, that there are some provisions left which ought to have been struck out. This is true, we think, in a high degree, of the introductory language of the note-issue section, wherein it is declared, as it was in the first draft of the bill, that the notes are to be issued "for the purpose of making advances to the Federal reserve banks, . . . and for no other purpose." Our opinion, ever since we first referred to this declaration, six months ago, has been that, considered merely as a statement of facts, it is untrue. The notes, to be sure, are "issued," in a technical sense, by the Government to the regional banks; their issue differing in this respect in no wise from the manner in which the present national banknotes are assigned to individual banks. But it follows from this very comparison that the new notes will no more be "advances" by Government to banks than are the national banknotes, and no one was ever foolish enough to describe our existing banknote circulation as such an operation.

Since, then, a condition is declared to exist which palpably does not exist, it follows that, so far as regards its bearing on actual operation of the law, the declaration is a mere dead letter. The real evil in it is the possibility that at some future date it may be cited as a precedent for the actual issue of Government paper, as a loan to private industry. Its incidental evil has been the handle which the futile declaration gave to critics like Mr. Vanderlip and Senator Root, in their contention that the measure created fiat money. To believe that absurdity, it was necessary first to believe the absurdity which the bill itself declared.

We are confident that the general public will appraise this undoubted defect at its proper value, and will recognize that it neither does nor can injure the practical efficiency of the new provisions. Meantime, such reservation of judgment as still exists among competent students of the Banking and Currency Reform bill will properly converge on the standard to be fixed in the naming of the national board.

REPUBLICANS AND THE FUTURE.

There has doubtless been some exaggeration in describing as a great "crisis" the situation which confronted the National Republican Committee last week in Washington. It has been said that their decision would be big with the fate of their party. The party itself has been pictured as standing, at this juncture, between two worlds, one dead, the other powerless to be born. In all this there is more rhetoric than cold analysis. Yet it is not to be denied that much importance attaches to the deliberations and conclusions of the Committee. This is shown both by the eagerness with which the meeting was looked forward to and the general sense of disappointment at the result. The Committee may say that too much was demanded of them. But both the demand and the regret that it was not fully met are clear indications of the feeling that the Republican party, after a life of sixty years, had reached a turning-point in its history.

The decision of the Committee was frankly opportunist. There was the proposal of a special National Convention next year, to take the work of party reform vigorously in hand. This was rejected, but a series of State Conventions are to be asked to ratify the work of the Committee. That work itself is neither one thing nor the other, but a little of each. It does not strike at the root of unfair representation in the Convention; but it lops off a few branches. The South is to lose some eighty delegates, but will still be, on the basis of the actual Republican vote cast, grossly over-represented. On the other hand, the unreserved acceptance of the primary laws in all the States, coupled with the agreement to shear the National Committee of the power to "go behind the returns," and seat or unseat delegates after contests have been argued before it, will go a long way towards placating many hostile to the old régime. Evidence of this is furnished by the acquiescence of such men as Senator Borah and Gov. Hadley.

All this, however, relates only to party machinery. How about the pulse of the machine? What driving impulse, what new outlook, what inspiring issue, came out of this gathering of Republican leaders in Washington? Here we put the finger upon the real source of disappointment with the proceedings. It was hoped that some promising step would be taken towards winning back the Progressives to their old allegiance. There was also the expectation that a strong lead would be given as to the future policy of the party; some lines marked out on which the Democratic Administration could be successfully attacked; a cry raised to which the country could be rallied. But all this was left hanging. It may be that the Committee thought it wiser to leave measures of conciliation between Republicans and Progressives to be worked out quietly in the separate States, as they are actually working out in Indiana and Michigan and elsewhere. But as to thrilling appeals, or hailings of inspiring leaders, the difficulty was fundamental.

Their lack was made light of by the ingenuous Senator Smoot. "Issues," he cried, "what other issue do we need than mills closed and men out of work? And why deplore our dearth of leaders when all that we have to do is to rail at the blunders of the leaders on the other side?" This is not a very exalted sentiment, but it undoubtedly meets with temporary applause. That the Republican party stands to profit, to an extent, by the inevitable reaction against the party in power, is as certain as anything in politics can be. But there is scarcely an entire platform in that. A great party ought to be able to show that it has some other reason for existence than the desirability of having a club with which to beat over the head the men who are in office. The United States is still a good country to "bet on." In fact, intelligent foreign opinion just now favors the idea that this country is in better shape to face the existing world-wide financial depression than is either England or France or Germany. The check here ought to be slighter and the recovery more prompt. But whether it come soon or late, the expectation of business disaster is a mighty poor diet for a national party to feed upon.

Washington correspondents depicted the almost pathetic groping by the party of moral ideas for a moral issue. Such an issue could have been found if the spirit of its birth-year, 1856, still burned within its bosom. In that case, it would have done something to deal, not with the over-representation of the negro vote in the South, but with its suppression. All that class of ideas, however, seems to have gone bankrupt in the Republican party. It could not even assert, with any effect, its later grandiose programme of a strong central Government, with legislation for everything and control of everything; for the old States' rights party has gone Republicans several better. But a political party is one of the toughest animals, and the hardest to kill, known to natural history; and the mere fact that the Republicans are to-day so obviously without definite plans and forceful leadership, does not at all prove that the party may not, before many months, pull itself together and enter upon a new period of power and usefulness.

BURLESON'S HAPPY THOUGHTS.

When Postmaster-General Hitchcock came out with a sudden declaration in favor of Government ownership of the country's telegraph system, it was presently made perfectly plain that President Taft was unaware of this feature of the Postmaster-General's report, and he expressly repudiated the proposal. It seems in the highest degree improbable that any such situation existed in relation to Postmaster-General Burleson's recommendation of the same step, in his report made public last week. There can be little doubt that President Wilson had been in touch with Mr. Burleson regarding the matter, and that the discussion of it was not inserted in the report without the President's assent. But it does not in the least follow that he wished to be understood as committed to the scheme. Only a few days ago, another member of the Cabinet expressed himself with a good deal of freedom on another large matter of Governmental policy; but the country has not taken Mr. Redfield's exposition of his views on Trust legislation as indicating any practical purpose on the part of the Administration, at least for the immediate future. All the indications are that, after a preliminary ripple of more or less excitement, the country will settle down to the opinion that the President's assent to the raising of the Government telegraph question by Mr. Burleson was given merely with the idea that there would be no harm in throwing out a "feeler" on the subject.

Indeed, an examination of the way in which Mr. Burleson presents the matter should suffice, on general principles, to class his recommendation rather in the category of vaguely conceived plans for the future. He introduces it in immediate sequence to, and in the closest possible connection with, his statements concerning the fiscal results of the parcel-post undertaking. That this had long been a general desideratum, that it has supplied a public convenience, and that it is destined to become far more useful in the future, nobody denies. But it is certainly premature to pass upon the question of the degree of its profitableness. Mr. Burleson simply says that "it is expected that after the allowance of proper compensation to railroads for all service rendered there will come annually hereafter, as the result of the development of the parcel-post service, an increasing surplus." But waiving this point, there is between the addition of the parcel-post business to the previous similar operations of the Post Office and the taking over of the enormous plant and organization of the telegraph and telephone system a difference so vast and so vital that to make a simple inference from the result in the one case to the result in the other is almost ludicrous. And yet Mr. Burleson gravely sets it down that "the successful operation of the parcel post has demonstrated the capacity of the Government to conduct the public utilities which fall properly within the postal provision of the Constitution."

In one sense, of course, the conclusion here stated by Mr. Burleson is entirely true, whatever may be thought of his argument. It required no demonstration, by means of the parcel post or otherwise, to show "the capacity of the Government to conduct" the telegraph and telephone system. Everybody knows that if the Government were to take over that system, the system would go. The question is one of better or worse, of cheaper or dearer, of politically desirable or politically undesirable. It is by no means admitted that the Post Office performs its present functions with anything like the perfection which is to be desired. In some important particulars, its service is notoriously behind that of the best European post offices. As to the cost of the service, it must always be remembered that interest on the cost of the great plant of the Post Office Department in the shape of buildings and land is not reckoned as part of the annual outgo of the service as a whole; and as regards a special addition like the parcel post it requires the most conscientious, as well as the most careful, computation to determine how much of the general "overhead" charges should justly be assigned to it before a conclusion can be drawn. It must be recognized, on the other hand, that in the event of the absorption of the telegraph and telephone lines there would be a possibility of very great saving through consolidation of the two services; though against this must be placed an increase of expenditure, to which it would be difficult to assign a limit, caused by the comparative laxity of administration and liberality of compensation to be expected under Government ownership. Nor is the question of perfection of service, as indicated by comparison of European Government systems with American private-corporation systems, a matter to be lightly dismissed.

Whenever this vast scheme may seriously be brought before Congress, with the Administration for its sponsor, the public will have a right to expect that its recommendation shall be accompanied by an exhaustive, competent, and judicial examination of all phases of the problem. The total absence of such examination may be regarded as indicating that no such practical purpose exists at present. Nevertheless, we can but regard the utterance as untimely and unfortunate. A radical revision of the tariff had just gone into effect. A far-reaching reorganization of our banking and currency system was about to be instituted. Business is, owing to a number of causes, some of them of world-wide range, in a condition of great sensitiveness and of considerable depression. There is a time for all things, and this is not a time for injecting into the situation unnecessary elements of doubt. It is this consideration which is supposed to govern the President in the purpose generally ascribed to him to let Trust legislation alone for the present. If such is his feeling, it is evidently desirable that there shall be no needless disturbance of the public mind concerning the prospective attitude of the Administration. If he desires the country to have a period of rest during which the two great measures enacted at his instigation may have a chance to work out their results, Cabinet officers should not be permitted to create the impression that other big issues may be crowded close upon the heels of those which, for the past twelvemonth, have absorbed the attention of the country. If we are to have a rest, let us have a rest.

THE VOLUNTEER ARMY BILL.

The passing by the House the other day of the long-pending bill prescribing the methods to be pursued in raising a volunteer army was erroneously described as giving the President power to call out 200,000 men, while the suddenness of the House's action was attributed to the Mexican emergency. Undoubtedly, this may have had something to do with it, but the Senate plainly does not recognize that any crisis is at hand, for three weeks have passed and there is no expectation that it will act on the bill in haste. Probably it will not even take it up until well into the new year. When it does, it will merely act on legislation long urged by the War Department and proposed when nobody foresaw trouble in any quarter.

From this it does not follow that the bill is unimportant. It is important, if only because it radically alters the historic volunteer policy of the United States in various particulars. By it there is an effort to remedy the defects of the volunteer army of 1861-65, as well as others developed in 1898. It extends Federal control over the organization of volunteers to a degree which in 1861 would have been regarded, even in the North, as a serious invasion of States' rights, or at least the politicians' rights to appoint officers. Needless to say, it fixes no limit as to the number of volunteers the President may call out. The Washington correspondents who telegraphed the 200,000 figure could as truthfully have said that an army of a million was in contemplation because of Mexico. The bill merely prescribes how the President shall raise an army of volunteers after Congress has given him authority and has determined the number. Primarily, he must follow the procedure of the regular army, whose laws, orders, and regulations will be binding upon either the militia called into service or the volunteers. All three kinds of troops are to be on an exact parity as to organization and rights, no distinction being made even in the composition of courts-martial, which, differing from those of the past, may be composed of militia, volunteer, and regular officers without restriction.

The men of the volunteer forces are to be taken "as far as practicable" from the several States and Territories in proportion to their population, as heretofore. It is in the appointment of officers that we have a radical change, for these are all to be appointed by the President, subject to confirmation by the Senate. The officers from a State will perhaps be suggested to the President by the Governor of that State, but the President does not have to accept them unless he sees fit. He may appoint every single volunteer colonel from the regular army, for instance, for the bill permits the appointment of four regular officers to each volunteer regiment. Morcover, officers are not hereafter to be commissioned as belonging to any regiment, as, for instance, the First Massachusetts or the Tenth Connecticut, but will be appointed as captains or lieutenants or majors of Massachusetts or Connecticut volunteer infantry, so that they may be promoted according to seniority in the entire branch of the volunteers in which commissioned, and transferred from one regiment to another at will. Indeed, it is not clear that the old State titles will be preserved; so far as this bill is concerned, there is nothing to prevent every regiment's being called "The ——— Regiment of United States Volunteer Infantry." Commonsense will, however, doubtless dictate the retention of the State designations so that local pride and the spirit of emulation may be cultivated. The great point is that under this bill the President can prescribe the qualifications for officers and, if he chooses, exclude politicians like William Jennings Bryan when they aspire to be colonels without military knowledge.

Still another break with the past which will appeal particularly to our Civil War survivors is the provision requiring the establishment of a recruiting battalion for each regiment, to remain at home in order to drill and forward to the regiment men to make good the losses at the front. There was no greater military mistake in the Civil War on the part of the Federals than the recruiting of their armies by new regiments. Instead of being reinforced, the veteran organizations at the front were allowed to shrink to almost nothing. Sometimes a State would forward recruits if the regiment persisted in demanding them. Far more often the regiment was allowed to dwindle away. Thus the Twentieth Massachusetts, one of the bravest regiments that ever fought, took 243 men into battle at Gettysburg (where they lost 127), and similar figures testified to the fidelity of the First Minnesota and many other veteran organizations. Brigades were frequently half the size of a full regiment; yet as late as the Wilderness campaign, new regiments which had never heard a shot fired were placed in line of battle with officers as inexperienced as the men. The politicians liked the system for the patronage it created, and the army paid the price.

Every volunteer soldier, hereafter, will be enlisted for the entire war. There will be no more three-months or three-years men, if the bill passes; but it expressly stipulates that all volunteers are to be promptly mustered out as soon as the imminence of war passes or the war itself ends. Needless to say that the President will also appoint all staff officers of volunteers, including the quartermasters and the medical officers on whose efficiency so much depends, and this ought to insure the selection of as competent men as can be obtained. On the whole, the bill marks a distinct advance. There are things in it about which there will be two opinions, of course, as for instance whether under its provisions the regular army will not be robbed of too many of its officers at the beginning of hostilities in order to benefit the volunteers. But providing as it does a modern machinery to be used only in the event of war and replacing antiquated enactments, it is in principle unobjectionable.

TEN YEARS OF THE AEROPLANE.

With true dramatie sense Orville Wright chose the tenth anniversary of the now famous flight over the North Carolina sand dunes to announce that the real problem of the aeroplane today, the question of automatic stability, is on the point of solution. Improvements in mechanical invention do not always come from the hand of the original inventor. Yet it will seem eminently fit if the problem of making flight in a heavier-than-air machine normally safe should be solved by one of the men who made flight in a heavier-than-air machine normally possible. The achievements of the aeroplane need not be rehearsed in detail. We have travelled far from the first successful experiments at Kitty Hawk. The European seas have been forded by the aeroplane. The land area of Europe has been criss-crossed from north to south and from the Atlantic to St. Petersburg. The Alps have been surmounted, and altitudes higher than the tallest of Alpine peaks have been attained. The aeroplane omnibus has carried nearly a dozen men with safety. At the present moment an ambitious airman is on his way from Paris to Australia by way of Indo-China and the East Indian land bridges. The conquest of the Atlantic is predicted for the near future.

But it has been a process of development not devoid of vicissitudes. With continuous improvement in the gasolene motor, the radius and lifting power of the aeroplane have advanced rapidly. The element of safety has not kept pace. It is a regular feature of the day's news that the story of another triumph of airmanship in the matter of distance covered or altitude attained, or a difficult bit of navigation accomplished, should be followed by another of the disasters such as have marked the past year. In the public mind the question has remained whether the achievements of the aeroplane are not, after all, the achievements of specially qualified or exceptionally daring navigators. This suspicion is justified, though only in part. In reading the almost daily record of aeroplane mishaps, one must keep percentage in mind. In relation to the number of airmen now plying their trade and the air-mileage covered, it may probably be shown that the ratio of accident is decreasing. Nevertheless, the fact remains that, because of defects in the aeroplane and because of our ignorance of the laws of the medium it moves in, the element of accident is always present; and the expert is hardly more immune than the novice. The marvellous feats of a Pegoud are no guarantee that disaster will not overtake him in the course of a comparatively simple flight.

In one respect, the aeroplane, like its rival the dirigible, has failed on the whole to justify the first confident predictions. And this is in regard to the part that acronautics was to play in revolutionizing warfare. The idea of aerial navies has fascinated the public mind; and more than the public. The zeal with which the Governments of Europe have gone in for airship construction would seem to run counter to our statement. Germany and France both claim the supremacy of the air, according as the dirigible or the aeroplane, on which they have staked their respective hopes, comes to the front in the news of the day. At the present moment, for instance, the succession of disasters that has befallen Germany's giant Zeppelins has created an unmistakable reaction in favor of the heavier-than-air machine. But it is to be noted that the expert military partisans of neither acroplane nor dirigible are over-sanguine in their claims. The popular conception of aerial Dreadnoughts battling in the blue behind skirmish lines of aeroplane destroyers is not entertained on the General Staffs. As yet, the only service expected of the new military arm is that of reconnaissance.

And even in that field it is doubtful whether aeroplane and dirigible in the present stage of their development imply sweeping changes. A great European war would supply a thorough test. But in such military operations as have witnessed the participation of the aeroplane or the dirigible, their achievements have not been remarkable. The fact that bombs thrown from Italian airships have scattered a horde of Tripolitan tribesmen is of little meaning. A modern army equipped with high-elevation artillery might easily dispose of an airship raid. Skilful rifle fire has been shown to be effective in at least one instance, by picking off the aeroplane pilot on the wing. The wars in the Balkans were by no means slight affairs. Yet the only recorded achievement of the airmen was around Adrianople, where a Bulgarian navigator was described as encircling the city; but at a speed that would hardly make his observations of great value to the commander in the field. In general, one is inclined to think that the stress laid on reconnoitring in the air is exaggerated. A modern war on a large scale is not likely to be decided by superior information. Wireless, the field telephone, and the older systems of military signalling have reduced the possibility of secrecy to a minimum.

Nor does it fail to be gratifying that this stupendous human invention should not first be turned to the uses of slaughter. Orville Wright has stated his belief that the aeroplane will soonest come into use as a mail-carrier in sparsely settled regions devoid of railways. The aeroplane, for one thing, to be of practical value, must have its chain of stations, where it can take on supplies and make repairs at leisure; a condition hardly attainable under the stress of a military campaign. It is not at all impossible that before we see navies battling in the air we shall see aeroplanes crossing the Sahara along established routes and on something like schedule.

CAN THE "FOOL" BE REVIVED?

Though Shakespeare even in comedy gave the "fool" only a minor part, he seems to have felt with Jaques that for pure fun "motley's the only wear." After his day the fool fell into disuse; and if he may be said to have been revived at all, it has been at the hands of Bernard Shaw. But Shaw, for all his excellent nonsense, has taken the fool too seriously and made a hero of him. It would not be difficult to show that several of his leading characters embody the spirit of Touchstone, Feste, and others of that merry company. This is what must be meant when it is charged against Shaw that his personages, though seemingly versed in the ways of human nature, have no sense of emotional values. Like Touchstone's brain, theirs are as dry as the remainder biscuit after a voyage. Both sets of characters pretend to chaffer in the dry light of reason, where mere feeling never enters, and on the surface they are expert logicians. If Touchstone could convince the shepherd offhand that polished manners were an ample passport to the court, Mr. Shaw takes a whole play—his latest, "Galatea"—to snow that the acquisition of a refined pronunciation of the English language is all that is needed to make a duchess of a flower-vender, and an M.P. of a garbage collector. If the fool in "All's Well" can invent a specious justification of the unfaithful wife, Shaw constructs another play, "Man and Superman," out of a similar process of reasoning.

Some might wish, indeed, that Shakespeare had given greater latitude to his fools, but he at least kept on the side of safety. There is, in any case, an excellent chance for something approaching the Shakespearean fool on the stage to-day. The difficulty with Shaw's way is that, being so elaborate and pretentious himself, he is met by equally elaborate and pretentious arguments to prove that he must be fooling. But the true fool, by admitting himself a fool, is disarming, and despite his protests may chance to earn a reputation for profundity; just as in "Lear" the fool seems sometimes to be the only sane person on the stage. Our present American conditions are ripe for just such a minor personage, as may be seen by glancing at the usual method of dramatic satire. Suppose eugenics to be under fire. The ingredients of the play would be sure to be in part as follows: The son of a right liver would display a marked tendency to rakishness, after the manner of the traditional clergyman's son; and the marriage of an All-American centre rush with the intercollegiate woman champion at high jumping would be blest by a son who at the final curtain would perish of nervous exhaustion. The play might awaken laughter, but, with others, it would excite a still greater zeal than exists at present for statistics. Now, any drama which sets its opponents running to the refuge of figures is bound to be futile. What is needed both for the pure fun of the thing and to make eugenic faddists uncomfortable, is small doses of shrewd logic delivered by a character with whom it is impossible to take offence.

The American stage seems peculiarly suited to some such equivalent of the Shakespearean fool as we have in mind. For our audiences have sufficient homogeneity to catch the casual satire. Owing to the fact that everybody reads the newspapers, and the newspapers publish everything, top gallery and orchestra circle have much the same knowledge of current events and are not far separated in respect to tears and laughter. At present, the typical American's conception of comedy is largely shaped by so-called musical reviews, the spirit of which has affected the comic parts in even dignified plays. Every one knows what the humorous specialties are. The courtesies of subway life, the integrity of the political boss, the casuistry of the married man supposed to be passing the evening at his office, the politest ways of selling gold bricks, the severe but vulnerable father, are grist to the comedian's mill. In so far as the compass of his part is concerned, he corresponds well enough to the fool. He is an on-and-off-the-stage character, and often has no more lines than, say, Touchstone.

But he is a clown, not a fool, expert in clever tricks of countenance and intonation, and usually is also something of an athlete. He is dexterous in broad slap-stick humor, but knows nothing about the dry wit which was the fool's stock in trade. Owing to the wide influence of these musical comedies, wit, strictly so-called, has almost disappeared from the American stage.

Yet to many wit, properly administered, would seem to be about the best antidote for the super-optimism and gush enveloping many of the modern movements of which the stage should take account. Here is an admirable opportunity for the smart essayists who in increasing numbers are presuming to deal summarily with contemporary life. When they take to writing plays, as every one does, instead of spinning their wit out thin through the full career of a hero, let them concentrate it upon a minor character to serve as a sort of chorus. It is a character which should allure them. For the fool would also furnish them with an excuse for employing that modicum of cynicism which is the salt of wit and wisdom. Such a personage, if well contrived, could unquestionably be introduced with profit in light comedy and, once successful there, would quickly find his way into worthier drama. It would be something of a distinction to be the first to adapt the Shakespearean fool to modern American conditions.

RECENT GERMAN FICTION.

The schoolmaster plays a conspicuous part in contemporary German letters, not only as a type of frequent occurrence in drama and fiction, but as a writer of both. Hermann Stehr, the Silesian, is one of the most interesting personalities among the authors that have graduated from the schoolroom. His stories have much of the spiritual and the imaginative quality of his compatriots, Carl and Gerhart Hauptmann, with an indefinable individual flavor all their own. His latest book, "Geschichten aus dem Mandelhause" (Berlin: S. Fischer), is typical of his manner. German folklore has so frequently associated the tailor's trade with eccentricity, that Stehr could not quite get away from that preconceived notion, and has made his hero a very curious representative of his kind. But the interest really centres in his son, the child that had cost his wife her life, and that the lonely man adores as her precious legacy. The boy has inherited from his mother a morbid sensitiveness and the gift of song, from his father the tendency of weaving strange fancies and dreams. The widower and the motherless boy are taken care of by a deaf-and-dumb woman, who after some years of faithful service awakens in the emotional tailor a belated love-desire. He plans to make her his second wife, but the boy's singing keeps alive the memory of the first and troubles him; and when the boy is forbidden to sing, he pines away. Then the paternal love of the man asserts itself, and the innocent temptress is sent away. As the woman with her bundle leaves the house, the tailor is reverently bending over a chest in the garret which contains some relics of the dead wife. At this moment there comes from the room below the voice of the boy, who had long been silent on his invalid couch, bursting forth into a song which seems like the call of a new life and a brighter future for both. The mystic atmosphere of the land that bred Jacob Böhme hovers over the book and exercises a haunting spell upon the reader.

The latest novel by Arthur Schnitzler, "Frau Beate und ihr Sohn" (S. Fischer), has an absorbingly strong plot and a powerful psychological interest. The heroine, widowed at an early age, has a son who has just come to manhood and is infatuated with a former actress, from whom the mother is determined to separate the youth. But while she is devoting herself to this mission, she experiences an awakening of the love instinct and weakens at the plea of a college friend of her boy. A third young man plays the part of a Mephisto in this complicated dramatic situation. The characters are all of the world that Schnitzler knows so well and has familiarized us with in his plays and novels, and are drawn with his usual clear, firm touch; the actress is an especially sympathetic figure. When Frau Beate realizes that she is no better than this woman and discovers that her name, too, is lightly treated by the young men, she finds herself involved in a hopelessly tragic conflict, for which there seems to be only the conventional dramatic solution—expiation by death.

Traugott Tamm is not a well-known author, but one possessed of distinct merit. "Die Hingstberger" (Munich: Albert Langen) is a story with a very pronounced physiognomy. The call of the city has come to a little community in the heather-grown plains and has brought discord and distress to many a home. Young Jes Ole follows the lure, and out of the peace and the quiet of the paternal homestead drifts into the tumult of the sea-port. He makes many mistakes at the beginning of his commercial career and becomes involved in a love affair which threatens to demoralize him, but he issues as victor from the emotional conflicts and the economic struggles of his youth. Although his individual fate is the centre of interest, the charm of the story is largely derived from the animated background against which it is relieved: a city life full of color and light, of sharp contrasts, and dramatic interests. But its most commendable quality is its wholesomeness.

Ernst Weiss is a young Viennese writer, whose first work, "Die Galeere" (S. Fischer), is a most remarkable specimen of that analytical fiction which seems irresistibly to haunt the generation of German intellectuals, whose work responds to the demand for a scientific reading of life and for a close welding of life and letters. The hero is a young scholar engaged in study of the Roentgen-rays and haunted by the vague fear that their powerful influence upon the human tissues may produce fatal changes. Absorbed in his work, he does not notice, until it is too late, that he himself is the victim of that destructive force. The gradual decline of his mental powers is a rather depressing theme, but it is relieved by elements of conventional romance which lend a wider human interest.

Gerhard Ouckama Knoop is one of those authors who have always a surprise in store for their readers. He has no formula, no model that he faithfully observes in the construction of his stories. Each of his books has its own individual character and makes the impression of a rare spontaneity. His "Nadeshda Bachini," "Die Hochmögenden," and "Aus den Papieren des Freiherrn von Skarpl" are as widely apart in matter and manner as possible; and his latest book, "Unter König Max" (Berlin: Egon Fleischel & Co.), is again as different from its predecessors. He revives in this book the old Munich of the mid-century, and on the thread of the narrative, which is concerned with the experiences of men and women of the aristocracy and of the middle class, whom the exposition tempts to engage in mild speculation, he traces the gradual changes in the city's physiognomy when the newer parts are settled by foreign newcomers. The note of humor which enters into his sympathetic attitude towards his characters is especially charming; he succeeds in awakening in the reader a genuine interest in the ups and downs of their existence and in their mild emotional experiences. Glimpses of aristocratic and of "bourgeois" interiors, conversations suggesting the intellectual tastes and pursuits of the period, incidents which show the almost insurmountable barrier that separated the castes in that good old time, combine to make a very vivid and fascinating picture of the Munich that is no more. The book is such a novel and striking achievement that one is curious to see what the next development of the author will be.

A woman writer who is recently attracting attention has gone far back into the mediæval history of Munich. "Die tolle Herzogin" (Egon Fleischel & Co.), by Nanny Lambrecht, is a story of Jacobe, a Bavarian princess of unusual beauty and of extraordinary personality, who figures largely in the more intimate chronicles of the Bavarian court. She had given her first love to one beneath her, had been married to a hopeless idiot, Prince Johann Wilhelm of Jülich, and was murdered, a victim of political intrigue, in the palace of Düsseldorf. There she still goes about, as the "woman in white," bearing in her hand her own head with its glory of golden hair: a story which fired the imagination of young Heine and has since lost little of its human appeal. The author tells it not in the impersonal manner of ordinary historical fiction, but in a haunting impressionistic style, rich in color and quivering with the emotional intensity and the passionate pulse of the heroine's tragic life.

It seems a doubtful venture to-day to write a new book about Schiller, but Walter von Molo has undertaken the heroic task of writing not only one book, but a trilogy of novels about the poet who is as dear to the German heart as ever. The first story, "Ums Menschenthum," appeared about two years ago, and dealt with Schiller's earlier life. The second, under the title "Im Titanenkampf," has just been published (imported by G. E. Stechert & Co.), and covers the period in the life of Schiller which begins in Bauerbach, the home of his friend, Wolzogen, and ends in Darmstadt after the first and unsatisfactory meeting with Goethe. The poet was at that time absorbed in the fate of his "Fiesco," "Kabale und Liebe," and "Don Carlos," and harassed and worried beyond endurance by his struggle for a living. The author has not idealized his Titans, but draws their portraits with a well-tempered realism and an occasional touch of robust humor. Only one figure approaches caricature: Charlotte von Kalb, whose unfortunate nervous temperament and unhappy infatuation for Schiller make the impression of being cruelly overdrawn.

Max Geissler has a singular preference for places remote from the noisy highways of modern traffic and favoring a moderate pace of life which is of the past rather than the present. "Die Herrgottswiege" (Leipzig: L. Staackmann) is set in such an environment and has a peculiar touch of good old-fashioned romance. For it begins with a gypsy couple, the only foreigners in the village, selling their homestead to a poet who has taken a fancy to it and going out into the world to satisfy their racial "Wanderlust." The poet transforms the old house with the walnut tree before the door into a beautiful country residence. But the bride whom he brings to the valley with the curious name which gives the story its title, does not share his love of rustic quiet and solitude, and unable to adjust themselves to each other, they separate. Upon this conflict is built the simple plot of the narrative, which is mainly concerned with the hero's life, when he is once more alone in the dear old house. The character of this man stands out in strong relief against the background of the life he has chosen; he is a character that does not need the world. The wife, on the contrary, is of the type that drifts through life in a restless quest for some vague happiness which no man can give her; for the mysterious artist whom she joins and who does not appear until the end of the book, is also deserted by her. The simple country-girl who eventually becomes the mistress of the old house is drawn with much sympathy. But the main charm of the story lies in its wholesome open-air spirit and in its lyric passages.

Enrica Handel-Mazzetti, who some years ago created a great stir by her much-discussed story of the Thirty Years' War, "Die arme Margret," has written a Viennese society novel, which is not without a touch of Tendenz. For the heroine of "Brüderlein und Schwesterlein" (imported by G. E. Stechert & Co.) is a young girl brought up in a convent, and while she is still wrapt up in the pious sentiments instilled in her immature soul by the Reverend Mother, brutally thrust upon the marriage market by her own mother who wishes to join a title to her husband's millions. This well-worn theme is handled with a virile strength and a dramatic intensity which were already apparent in the author's earlier book, and are bound to leave a profound impression. The courtship of the girl by a nobleman, bankrupt in morals and purse, is offset by the touching friendship between her and the son of the janitress whom she had known since her childhood. There are other episodes revealing the appalling corruption of the girl's own family, of the society about her, of the whole world in which she is to live, yet the plot hangs well together and there is no evidence of padding. The characters are drawn in sharp, strong outlines, like those of an old woodcut, and the total impression left by the book is a picture of cruel power.

The apothecary has long been a figure much favored by German novelists, for in the small towns he is invested with a mysterious authority and comes next in rank after the pastor and the doctor. That Ernst Zahn, the Swiss writer, who is particularly lucky in his portrayal of quaint types, would sooner or later hit upon an apothecary, seemed a foregone conclusion. "Der Apotheker von Klein-Weltwil" (Stuttgart: Deutsche Verlagsanstalt) is the story of a man who has lived in the great centres of the world, has travelled much, and settles in the little Swiss town where he has inherited the pharmacy of his uncle. A philosopher with a touch of world-wise cynicism, he enjoys for a time to be the onlooker in the human tragi-comedies played upon this little stage; and he himself is an actor, a deus ex machina, who pulls the wires and shifts about the figures. Interesting characters they all are: the old assistant who served the uncle before him, the aged parson, the factory-magnate with the two sons, whose widely different temperaments are the cause of much sorrow to the mother, the housekeeper whom the hero has brought with him, and the women of the village with whom he becomes acquainted. The book has a charm faintly suggesting memories of Wilhelm Raabe.

NEWS FOR BIBLIOPHILES.

If to be born in New York and to write and publish stories in London be sufficient qualification, then Charlotte Lennox is entitled to a place among the early women novelists of America. But her memory is now only preserved by her association with Johnson, in a friendship warm and sincere which gave her writings the occasional advantages of his friendly pen.

She was the daughter of Col. James Ramsay, who was Lieutenant-Governor of New York, where she was born in 1720. Her colonial experiences could not have been very extensive, as she was sent to England in 1735, and married in 1748, or thereabouts, for little seems to be known of either her marriage or her husband. That he was not a mere phantom we know from his recorded presence at the famous all-night sitting held in the spring of 1751 at the suggestion of Johnson to celebrate the approaching issue of Mrs. Lennox's first novel. Sir John Hawkins, who had never before stopped up all night, and was plagued by toothache, was one of the score of guests, and tells us that Johnson's face in the morning at five "shone with meridian splendor, though his drink had been only lemonade." He invested Mrs. Lennox with a crown of laurel, invoking the Muses in strains which Hawkins has failed to report. Also it may be noted that the apple-pie provided by Johnson for the supper at the Devil Tavern was decorated with bay leaves.

Her later writings included a play which ran for but one night and some translations from the French. She was a great favorite with Johnson, who helped her in various undertakings. What would present-day readers say to the incident in her "Henriette," where two young ladies meeting for the first time in a stage coach propose to swear eternal friendship to each other? Her "Shakespeare Illustrated" was perhaps the first effort to show the sources used by our great dramatist. Her varied literary work, including the editing of a ladies' magazine, did not bring her riches and she died in poverty in 1804.

The most famous production of her pen was "The Female Quixote," which appeared in 1752, and perhaps owed most of its success to the courage with which it challenged comparison with "Don Quixote." There is a measureless distance between Miguel Cervantes and Charlotte Lennox, and any comparison of the real Quixote and the imitation is impossible. Lady Bella, "the female Quixote," is the daughter of the Marquis of ——— and has been brought up in the country, where her father, a disappointed politician, avoids society. She has lost her mother, and has grown up with a mind filled with the nonsense of the tedious and long-winded romances of Scudéry and La Calprenède. But apart from regarding the absurd incidents and ridiculous speeches of the "Grand Cyrus" as models for life and conversation, Lady Bella is held up for our admiration as a marvel of good sense. The modern reader will, for the most part, regard her as lacking in courtesy, and loquacious and conceited beyond endurance. Mr. Selvin has made a remark about Pisistratus—

"You are mistaken, sir," said Bella, "if you believe there was any truth in the report of his having wounded himself; it was done either by his rival Lycurgus, or Theocrites; who, believing him still to be in love with the fair Cerinthe, whom he courted, took that way to get rid of him. Neither is it true, that ambition alone inspired Pisistratus with a design of enslaving his country: those authors who say so must know little of the springs and motives of his conduct. It was neither ambition nor revenge that made him act as he did; it was the violent affection he conceived for the beautiful Cleorante, whom he first saw at the famous baths of Thermopylæ, which put him upon those designs, for seeing that Lycurgus, who was not his rival in ambition, but love, would certainly become the possessor of Cleorante, unless he made himself tyrant of Athens, he had recourse to that violent method, in order to preserve her for himself."

Thus Lady Bella. Every man she sees is either a "ravisher" bent on her abduction or a prince in disguise desirous of marrying her, and she will listen to no explanation of the incidents out of which she constructs these imaginary plots. And she is proof against the mortification of the disclaimers from supposed suitors. Her cousin Glanville, who, with her father's approval, wishes to marry her, has a sorry time in sometimes attempting to humor her romantic whims, and in sometimes endeavoring to convince her of the folly of her vagaries. Because Clélie in the romance swims across the Tiber, Lady Bella throws herself into the Thames at Richmond, and does not succeed in reaching the opposite bank, but is picked up in midstream, and in the fever which follows is convinced of the folly of taking her heroine too literally. One agent in this conversion is the confession of a rival suitor of the little comedy by which he had made her believe that Glanville was another name for Ariamenas and that he had been guilty of the crime of endeavoring to obtain the hand of the Princess of Gaul at the same time that he was so vainly courting Lady Bella. Of such skimble-skamble stuff is the "Female Quixote" composed.

Dr. Johnson supplied the dedication to the Earl of Middlesex, who it may be hoped paid handsomely in cash for the compliments bestowed upon him. How much further did Johnson aid the young lady in this book? The Rev. John Mitford in two essays which appeared in the Gentleman's Magazine for August, 1843, and January, 1844, suggested that the closing part of the book came from his pen, and the authoress seems to give a hint of extraneous aid when the last chapter is described as being in her "opinion the best chapter in this history." Mr. Austin Dobson, in "Some Eighteenth Century Vignettes," has included one of Charlotte Lennox, but he does not enter into the question here discussed.

A higher critic might easily imagine that Charlotte Lennox had brought her MS. of the last chapter, with its compliments to Richardson and the author of the Rambler, to Johnson, and he, seeing it to be somewhat lame and impotent, had written round it the account of the discussion between Lady Bella and the grave Divine, in which she is finally convinced that Scudéry is not an infallible authority on classical history and that the speeches and actions of the heroine La Calprenède cannot be adjusted to the details of eighteenth century society without serious damage to life and limb.

The style of this last chapter is distinctly Johnsonian, and has a virile touch absent from the rest of Charlotte Lennox's fiction. The hint given by Mitford has not been followed up and is therefore worth noting for a new generation of Johnsonian critics and collectors.

THE MEXICAN LEADERS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: "The justice of the cause which Francisco Villa represents," to quote from a recent editorial article of the Nation, is a phrase that will probably strike as queer any and every American possessing first-hand knowledge of conditions in northern Mexico. Is it possible that the Nation believes that a cutthroat of twenty years' standing is in the field in behalf of legitimate, constitutional government? Has the Nation allowed itself to be humbugged by that silly shibboleth, constitucionalista?

What are the facts of the case? Mexico has a population of about 14,000,000 people, of whom 2,000,000 are whites of Spanish descent. The remainder, 12,000,000, are the original inhabitants, Aztecs, Zapotecs, Toltecs, Mayas, etc., commonly called peons. Not more than 10 per cent. of these peons can read or write. In culture they range all the way from the savage Yaquis and Coras to the useful and trustworthhy cargadores of the towns. The average peon is mentally a child and morally a savage. Compelled by a strong Government to adapt his conduct to the standards of civilized life, he is a useful and generally contented member of the community; but the minute the compelling pressure is removed, he relapses into his primitive savagery.

Villa, Zapata, Orozco, et al. are simply savages of superior intelligence. They are not taking up arms for the purpose of furthering clean, honest government, equal rights, incorruptible judiciary, abolition of the spoils system, universal suffrage, and representative, republican institutions. On the contrary, they take the field because that affords them an opportunity to murder, rob, and torture. They make no pretence at civilized warfare; they descend on a hacienda or pueblo, run off the stock, steal everything they can lay hands on, murder and mutilate the males and violate such women and girls as appeal to their savage lust. The only class that is exempt from their ravages is the pelado who has nothing more than a few handfuls of frijoles and maiz—on the well-known principle of vacuus viator cantabit.

Nor are they upheld by any class of the people or by any secret society, as formerly in Naples and Sicily. They rob, butcher, and torture anybody and everybody that falls into their clutches, regardless of sex, age, religion, politics, and nationality. They are out for loot and nothing else. They are not fighting for a purer, better government; they are fighting against any and all sorts of government. Government that protects the weak against the poor, secures to every man the fruit of his labor and self-denial, that hands out absolute justice—all that is anathema to them and always has been. Those people never built a railway, factory, or a dock, never irrigated a desert or reclaimed a swamp. They never constructed anything. But they might have been found years ago hidden in a lonely defile ready to pick off the arrieros of a pack train from the mines, skulking in the dead of night to rob a ranch or waylay a solitary traveller. They are still at their ancient trade, only on a larger scale.

And that is the class of man that the Nation is upholding. VÁLGAME DIOS!

THE INVENTOR OF THE STEAMBOAT.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your review of the new book, "Robert Fulton, Engineer and Artist" (Nation, December 4), calls to mind that full justice was never given to Fulton by English writers. The Britannica says that the first practical steamboat was built in 1802 by Symmington, and tried on the Forth and Clyde. In the small American school histories full credit for the invention of the steamboat in 1807 is given to Robert Fulton.

Probably few persons really know who invented the steamboat, although all the standard American authorities, including Webster's Dictionary and Appleton's Encyclopædia of Biography, tell the truth in simple terms. Webster says: "John Fitch, American Inventor, Steamboat." Appleton's tells the whole story, which can be verified by the patent proceedings before the New York State Legislature. The Committee reported that "the steamboats built by Robert Fulton [in 1807] were the patent of John Fitch, in 1791, and that Fitch had the exclusive right." This is a decision of record, and cannot be controverted.

In 1785 the idea of propelling a boat by steam came to John Fitch. He wrote:

I was ignorant that a steam engine had ever been invented. The propelling of a boat by steam is as new as the rowing of a boat by angels.

On July 27 he wrote to the Speaker of the Pennsylvania Legislature:

I am of the opinion that a vessel may be carried six, seven, or ten miles an hour by the force of steam, and believe it will answer for sea voyages. Should I suggest that the navigation between this country and Europe may be made so easy as shortly to make us the most popular empire on earth, it probably, at this time, would make the whole very laughable.

In October, 1788, thirty passengers were taken by his boat twenty miles from Philadelphia to Burlington in about three hours. Later, it ran ninety-one miles in one day, and became a regular passenger boat. This was nineteen years before the "invention" of the Clermont from Fitch's plans. The New York Magazine of August 13, 1790, said: "Fitch's steamboat really performs to a charm." It went from 2,000 to 3,000 miles that summer on regular passenger runs. A larger boat, the Perseverance, was built, but was damaged by storm. Stockholders would not put up more money. Fitch was ruined. In 1793 he went to France at the solicitation of the United States Consul at L'Orient. But France was in the midst of the Revolution, and Fitch left his valuable drawings with the Consul, and went to England. In 1794 he worked his passage home. In 1796 he ran a steamboat on Collect Pond, the site of the present Tombs Prison, New York. He returned to Bardstown, Ky., where he had taken up small lands. He found these squatted upon, and he committed suicide.

Robert Fulton was in Philadelphia in 1785, and must have known about Fitch's steamboat. Fulton was in Paris from 1797 to 1804, and visited Mr. Vail, the United States Consul, who had Fitch's drawings. Mr. Vail said: "I lent Mr. Fulton all the specifications and drawings of Mr. Fitch, and he kept them several months."

All the above evidence is a matter of record, easily to be obtained by the English writers who give all the credit to Symmington, and by the popular American writers who think that Robert Fulton invented the steamboat. Fulton should have great credit for his perseverance in working up Fitch's plans to commercial success. Yet one cannot help thinking that if English writers believe we wrongly put forward Robert Fulton as the "inventor" of the steamboat, they have the right to claim successful priority by five years, for Symmington's boat was a good one. But John Fitch's boat ran three miles an hour faster than the famous Clermont, and did it about twenty years before the Clermont was built. HERBERT JOSEPH FITCH.

A CORRECTION.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In my Bibliophile paper of the life of Napoleon, in the Nation of December 11, the statement is made that the Indiana State Library has only a typewritten copy of the book. The librarian informs me that the copy now in the Library "is intact to page 241, and from there on a few pages have been added in type."

The original statement was taken from a personal letter written by a man who seemed in a position to know, and so care was not taken to verify it, as should have been done. H. M. KINGERY.

OPERA AT MUNICH.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: As an Englishman who has resided permanently in Munich for the last eight years, I am extremely interested in the discussion in your columns about Munich as a town with "good second-class opera." You may be interested to hear that above 79,000 Americans visited Munich in the last twelve months, of whom no fewer than ten thousand attended the Wagner Summer Festival at the Prince Regent's Theatre. At every performance 50 per cent. of the audience were Americans. If your contributor is correct in his surmises, these ten thousand Americans did not know what they were doing and should have stopped away. No, sir, Munich is not a "one-horse town," and the opera given here is not second-class, however much other interested cliques may affirm.

DR. MAURICE L. ETTINGHAUSEN.

Munich, November 19.

[The Nation of September 25 said, in support of the new venture in popular opera at the Century: "Among New York city's five millions there must be Munichs and Budapests and Milans and Dresdens; large population groups, that is, of honest provincial taste, who, if they followed their natural inclinations, would be happy with second-class opera (i. e., opera without such highly paid singers as Caruso) and a second-class seat at a good play."—ED. A QUESTION OF ICONOGRAPHY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Will you spare me space to ask help from your readers on a point of iconography? I desire to know if any one can supply an instance in authenticated Italian painting of the Three Persons of the Trinity represented identically alike, without distinction or difference. This occurs in a small portable altar-piece at the Metropolitan Museum labelled "School of Siena." Your readers will recall, doubtless, at once the leaf painted by Jean Fouquet in the "Hours of Etienne Chevalier" at Chantilly, and probably also the great Coronation by Enguerrand Charenton at Villeneuve-les-Avignon (which was shown at the Paris Exposition of French Primitives in 1904), for which the contract prescribed: "En cet paradis doit être la Sainte Trinité et du Père et du Fils ne doit avoir nulle difference," and there are other instances, of course, in French art. In this little triptych in New York the Three Persons are seated at a table, indistinguishable in dress, gesture, and face. The Pietà, on the same panel, strongly recalls that now in the Louvre, which comes also from Avignon. In addition to these reminiscences of work done in the South of France, it has others of the art of the North of Spain—of Catalonia. The accomplished curator, however, is quite positive in calling it "Tuscan." The subject of Catalan art is new and far from sure, but all the more matter for study, and if this small altar-piece should prove to come from Catalonia (and a good deal of evidence seems to point that way) and not from Siena (which the quality of the design makes to my mind improbable), it would immediately become more interesting and perhaps more valuable. My own immediate and practical interest lies in the iconographical significance for a little manual that I am working on.

OLD FRENCH WORDS IN ENGLISH.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: A careful rereading of "Gargantua" in the edition of Rabelais now in progress of publication by the Société des Etudes Rabelaisiennes has brought to my attention a fact sufficiently commonplace, but illustrated with peculiar vividness in this text. I mean the number of words more or less current in sixteenth-century French that have quite disappeared from the vocabulary of to-day, yet survive in modern English. To a certain extent, this is noticeable in authors even of the seventeenth century; I associate it especially with Molière and La Fontaine; but it is of far more frequent occurrence in Montaigne and more frequent still in Rabelais. The philological notes in the new edition are, if anything, too numerous; but it is a pity that, by doing away with a few of the voluminous illustrative passages from other authors, the editors did not find room to call attention to the survival in English of various words that are now obsolete in French. Such notes would be of special interest to cultured Frenchmen, most of whom are doubtless unaware of the existence of such forms in our tongue. As a linguistic phenomenon it is partly analogous to the traces of older forms left in the language of this country that have disappeared in England. I say "partly," for in some cases the English word has come not from the French, but directly from the Latin.

I have noted upwards of fifty such words in "Gargantua" alone. I find, among many more, paragon, remembrée, remembrance (which survives as late as La Fontaine), translatay, haste! (=faites hâte), pine (= épingle), perturbé, phantasme, contemptible, oust (Eng. host, an army), route, temple (= tempe, the sides of the head between forehead and ear), espies (= espions; the old word is found in J. J. Rousseau; query: English influence?), conventz (= convents), mute (=muet), depopulé, le bon tour (=le bon office, Eng. a good turn; the old locution is found in La Fontaine), hoirs (= héritiers; the old word survives in jurisprudence), manequins (here the French and English words are alike from the Dutch; the one has been taken and the other left), clere (cf. Eng. clerestory), librairies (= bibliothèques; the change in meaning is not grasped by the clerks in the French departments of various New York shops; they speak glibly of the "Library Champion," the "Library Conard," etc.).

I have notes by me of many more words, but the above will serve as examples. One hopes that in the volumes of "Pantagruel" the editors will throw light upon certain words by consulting an English dictionary. SAMUEL C. CHEW, JR.

Literature

ALFRED NOYES.

Collected Poems. By Alfred Noyes. New York: Frederick A. Stokes Co. 2 vols. $3 net.

Now that Mr. Noyes's poetry has been collected into the compass of a pair of volumes, it is comparatively easy to see the reason of his reputation and popularity among those who are still seriously disposed towards poetry. In an eminent degree Mr. Noyes voices the inherent romanticism of his age. The eighteenth century was not a romantic age; nor in the ordinary sense of the term was the later nineteenth century—it was rather a realistic or naturalistic one. But the very close of that century and the beginning of the twentieth have seen a remarkable revival of romantic feeling. And, singularly enough—or perhaps not so singularly, when we think of it as a reaction from the preceding æstheticism of one kind and another—it has thrown back, for its inspiration, to the great age of romantic barbarism. At least it has the same cult of violence and force as the glorious old romanticism of Elizabeth, beside which that of Wordsworth, Coleridge, and even Shelley seems tame and refrigerated. Rebellious as the latter was, it wanted the tremendous Titanism of the original Prometheans. In particular it lacked the grandiose conception of nationalism, imperialism, and world-domination combined with a lust of adventure, expansion, and power. For this reason it is not astonishing that, moved by a revival of the same spirit, Mr. Noyes should have looked to the elder age for his most characteristic themes and motives, as in his "Drake" and his "Tales of the Mermaid Tavern."

To be sure, Mr. Noyes was not always quite as he appears in his later and maturer work. His final position is the result of a gradual development. In the beginning he seems, like most young poets, to have been more or less seduced by the witchery of his craft. In this sense he was influenced, as was only natural, by the decadence of the nineteenth century. He, too, was not quite guiltless of dabbling in l'art pour l'art, with an admiring eye to Baudelaire, de Banville, and Gautier. A few of his lighter pieces also, as in "The Flower of Old Japan," are oddly, almost whimsically remindful of Gilbert and Sullivan. Or, again, he recalls Stevenson, the least Elizabethan of all men. Some of these things, as preserved in the collection, have come to seem singularly pretty, effete, and fin de siècle in comparison with the current fashion:

All along the purple creek, lit with silver foam,
Silent, silent voices, cry no more of home!
Soft beyond the cherry-trees, o'er the dim lagoon,
Dawns the crimson lantern of the large low moon.

But on the whole, and in spite of these deflections, it is towards the Elizabethan theme and motive that he is inevitably borne. Even his weaknesses have the same general character: he is inclined to diffuseness, lack of economy, extravagance of resources. Most of his lyrics would be better if they were more compact and sudden. He flows and eddies and swirls around his subject. He writes too readily and too much. Of itself his style is naturally expansive and in so far epical. And it is, no doubt, for that reason that his later and narrative poems are the most successful.

Nevertheless, he differs in some important respects from his prototypes—if such they may be called. In the first place, as is true of almost all reactionaries, there is an elegiac or nostalgic note clearly perceptible amid all the martial and heroic clangor of his music—the sensible regret of a past that, when all is said and done, is dead forever and can never be restored and but feebly imitated:

Marlowe is dead, and Greene is in his grave,
And sweet Will Shakespeare long ago is gone!
Our Ocean-shepherd sleeps beneath the wave;
Robin is dead, and Marlowe in his grave.
Why should I stay to chant an idle stave,
And in my Mermaid Tavern drink alone?
For Kit is dead, and Greene is in his grave,
And sweet Will Shakespeare long ago is gone.

Where is the singer of the Faërie Queen?
Where are the lyric lips of Astrophel?
Long, long ago their quiet graves were green;
Ay, and the grave, too, of their Faërie Queen!
And yet their faces, hovering here unseen,
Call me to taste their new-found œnomel;
To sup with him who sang the Faërie Queen;
To drink with him whose name was Astrophel.

This is a very different thing from the profound Elizabethan melancholy, with its desperate loathing of life and its voluptuous gloating on death; it is at once more deliberate and self-admiring.

And then, again, with all his imperialism, there is a kind of sentimental humanitarianism about him, which is of a later age, too. It is a sentiment which finds perhaps its clearest expression—of all places—in the prologue to the American edition of "Drake":

England, my mother,
Lift to my western sweetheart
One full cup of English mead, breathing of the may!
Pledge the may-flower in her face that you and ah, none other,
Sent her from the mother-land
Across the dashing spray. . . .
Sweetheart, ah, be tender—
Tender with her prayer to-night!
Such a goal might yet be ours—the battle-flags be furled,
All the wars of earth be crushed, if only now your slender
Hand should grasp her gnarled old hand
And federate the world. . . .

Over all this earth, sweet,
The poor and weak look up to you—
Lift their burdened shoulders, stretch their fettered hands in prayer:
You, with gentle hands, can bring the world-wide dream to birth, sweet,
While I lift this cup to you
And wonder—will she care?

As a matter of fact, the eighteenth century was the originator of two humanitarianisms, though we usually think of but one in connection with it. There was the rational one represented by Voltaire, which recognized an intellectual kinship among human beings through the bond of a common reason and morality or discipline. And there was a sentimental one, like that of Rousseau, which put all men upon a common level by virtue of a common nature—a nature subject to the same sensibilities and passions. It is the latter that has descended to us. To-day man is no longer unique, as he is a reasonable being, as he has a mind and a conscience and can be depended upon to think and to behave on a rational principle; this is no longer his mark and character separating him from animal and thing. Rather, he is all of a family as he reacts to similar sensuous and emotional stimuli; and he is affiliated with other animals on the same grounds—as well as with the insensate objects to whose stimuli he responds. He is no longer one of an aristocracy of mind; he is one of a democracy of impulse, whose strongest appeal is that he is the passive sufferer of a like fate with ourselves and the perishable universe. And it is this sort of sentimental humanitarianism which seems to combine with Mr. Noyes's romanticism, as in his "Rank and File," and give to it, as to our age, much of its peculiar character:

Drum-taps! Drum-taps! Who is it marching,
Marching past in the night? Ah, hark,
Draw your curtains aside and see
Endless ranks of the stars o'er-arching,
Endless ranks of an army marching,
Marching out of the measureless dark,
Marching away to Eternity.

See the gleam of the white, sad faces
Moving steadily, row on row,
Marching away to their hopeless wars:
Drum-taps, drum-taps, where are they marching?
Terrible, beautiful, human faces,
Common as dirt, but softer than snow,
Coarser than clay, but calm as the stars. . . .

Hints and facets of One—the Eternal,
Faces of grief, compassion, and pain,
Faces of hunger, faces of stone,

Faces of love and of labor, marching,
Changing facets of One—the Eternal,
Streaming up thro' the wind and the rain,
All together and each alone.

To be sure, in spite of his popularity, Mr. Noyes does not express all the ferment of his period. There is still a lingering of naturalism in our time—the sheer brutality of romanticism so admirably expressed by Mr. Masefield and differing from the Elizabethan in that it fails to be dominated by heroic ideas. On the whole, the age of Elizabeth was heroic and romantic; on the whole, ours is romantic but not heroic. Mr. Masefield is realistic and brutal, and expresses a part of us; Mr. Noyes is sentimental and humanitarian, and expresses another part of us. The great poet of the age, for whom we pretend to be looking, will express both, if he ever arrives; he will be at once sentimental and brutal and realistic and humanitarian.

CURRENT FICTION.

Dirk: A South African. By Annabella Bruce Marchand. New York: Longmans, Green & Co.

This is a story of a little Boer dorp: for all that, it is a novel in the great Victorian tradition. No one can read it without being reminded of Thackeray, of Meredith, and most often, perhaps, of George Eliot. But it is in no sense imitative of anything but life; it owes less to any of these masters than "Joseph Vance," for instance, owes to Dickens. It covers a period of some thirty years, ending in the eighties. Against the background of the mountains and the veldt it gives a lovingly minute and truthful picture of the life of the little village of Groenvallei—the farm, the kitchen, the stoep, the church, the general store. It presents with large sympathy and shrewdness and occasional keen irony a numerous and surprisingly varied group of characters.

In many novels, though the scene be nominally in London, the leading characters seem to be by themselves, cut off from the world in a corner of nowhere. Dirk van Rooyen in Groenvallei has the advantage of growing up among very real and substantial human beings. As a child he sees his family ruined by Niemeyer, the unscrupulous lappie-smous, or peddler; his older brothers go to the bad, and his father and mother die broken-hearted. To take vengeance upon Niemeyer becomes the great passion of his life, and he educates himself with an eye single to this end. But he falls in love with Fanny, the good and gentle daughter of his enemy, a woman of the type that Fielding and Thackeray worshipped. It is strange to meet her among the pert and sophisticated heroines of to-day, strange and most refreshing. We shall not anticipate the story of Dirk's career, drawn this way and that by the two great motives of his life. It is enough to say, as Dryden did of a greater book, that here is God's plenty.

The Spider's Web. By Reginald Wright Kauffman. New York: Moffat, Yard & Co.

Mr. Kauffman's shrill voice rises a note or two during this number; there is danger, or hope, that in time it may attain a pitch no longer perceptible to the human ear. But doubtless the superman will have finer sensibilities. This is, it appears, the last of a group of four novels, planned by the author as long as four years ago, and artfully put forth, one by one, without intimation of their real character as a "cycle." Public and publishers, he had noted, were afraid of cycles. Nor, the question of method confronting him, did he think it advisable to approach his audience by means of art. "I did not want to produce the effect of a work of art; I wanted to produce conviction of truth." "The superimposing of one human being's will, or the will of any group of human beings, upon any other's, is the Great Crime." Modern society is determined by such superimposition. Our economic system is based upon it—and is the villain of the cycle.

In the first three novels, "The House of Bondage," "The Sentence of Silence," and "Running Sands," the artificial compulsions of society upon the relation of the sexes are chiefly dwelt upon. Whether because they eschewed art, or because they contained a good deal of salacity, the books soon had many readers. Possessing their negative merit—it is certainly not a work of art—the present story lacks the positive appeal of its predecessors. There are only two or three bits of nastiness in the book. Its range is wider, it attempts to carry the theory of social compulsion to its logical conclusion. Luke Huber, the hero, comes to New York from the provinces, with the aim of reforming that city. He discovers that the city, and the whole country, is in the grip of a money-power which he at first identifies with one man, but in the end sees to be a system. He tries to battle with that power, is made the head of a "reform" party—and presently finds himself alone.

The discovery that even the Church bows down to Mammon is the final stroke. Luke Huber is converted to disbelief as others are converted to belief. He "comes to see the sin of compulsion exerting itself against humanity in all the powers that conduct modern society; in the ownership of men and things; in our entire system of production and distribution, and in the creatures and ministers of that system: Government, Politics, Law, and what passes by the name of Religion." This is not precisely new doctrine, and we suspect that it can be made fresh and living in fiction only by the employment of that art which Mr. Kauffman so conscientiously and successfully avoids.

The Desire of the Moth. By Maxwell Gray. New York: D. Appleton & Co.

An insubstantial title for a solid and thoughtful book. Though reduced to average bulk by the use of rather small type, it is considerably longer than the average novel. Ronald Leith, the hero, belongs to a class rare in fiction. Sixty years old when the story opens, he is introduced to us as a bank clerk, unfitted by nature for his position, who has failed of promotion and is about to be superannuated. He has a commonplace wife considerably his junior, and a daughter who is the apple of his eye. We see him, sensitive and of fine grain, buffeted by life and bowed down by the losing struggle against poverty. But he is a man with an unusual past, and his past suddenly reasserts itself in two ways, one material and one spiritual. A faithless friend, whom he had trusted and rescued from disgrace, dies and leaves him a large legacy. As a young soldier, he had been passionately in love with Beatrice della Rovesca, the daughter of a noble Italian family. Her apparent betrayal of him into a Sicilian ambush from which he barely escaped with his life has darkened his whole view of the world. By an accidental discovery in an old letter, he learns that she had really been faithful and had tried to warn him. Under the stimulus of these events he quickly regains his former resourcefulness and spirit.

The style of the book is elaborate and allusive, at times slightly reminiscent of Meredith, though it lacks both his brilliance and his obscurity. Occasionally the narrative is overweighted with description. But in the main the author handles a complicated plot and a large group of characters with notable vigor and skill; and the strong and appealing figure of Ronald Leith finely dominates the story.

Mascarosc. By Gordon Arthur Smith. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.

A troubadour set out to sing the glory of God and love and to sow a seed of happiness in the hearts of all. He came at length to the castle of Gavarret, and was there made welcome for his song. But the seed that he sowed spread too quickly, and ere long all were possessed of the malady of love. The Lady of Gavarret accordingly lost her heart to the troubadour, who accepted it not, as his own was pledged to Mascarosc, a maiden of the woods. The lady's mother re-lost hers to a tiny page; the kitchen-maid became enamoured of the guard, and all rejoiced in their affliction. Moreover, the fair Lady of Gavarret would not be outdone, and she gave her heart to the Lord of Gavarret's chief rival. But the Lord of the manor was jealous of the happiness of all, and determined to destroy it. So he drove Aimar, the troubadour, from his castle. Not until Heaven intervened to punish the wicked Lord and permit happiness to his Lady, could Marlatz of Arc storm the castle and kill the wicked Lord.

IN PRAISE OF SPAIN.

Royal Spain of To-day. By Tryphosa Bates Batcheller. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. $5 net.

Few Americans are bold enough to venture a motor tour through Spain. Still fewer can boast of such a journey made in the company of a princess of the blood royal. Mrs. Tryphosa Bates Batcheller, of Boston, however, braved the rough roads of Spain, taking as her guest the Infanta Eulalia, best known to Americans through her official visit to the Chicago World's Fair of 1893. Other members of the party were an efficient chauffeur, an inefficient ladies' maid, and F. B., who plays an unobtrusive rôle as signer of checks, purchaser of gasolene, and filler of the thermos bottles. For the infanta must have her five o'clock Ceylon with unfailing punctuality. She takes it, we are told, without sugar and cream.

Such a trip, taken by such a company, was sure to result in interesting experiences, raw material for a 600-page book of travel. At Barcelona the self-willed infanta seems to have shocked her American friends by excessive democracy. Every native of that city, as all the world knows, is a potential thrower of bombs, yet Eulalia insisted upon strolling on the Rambla, and under such circumstances every promenade became a thrilling experience. Happily, the infanta succeeded in maintaining her incognito, and all went well, barring a few unfortunate experiences at hotels. All these vicissitudes of travel she bore with perfect good-nature, and only twice lost her royal temper: once when the Governor-General of Granada wanted to take her to church instead of to see the gypsies, and again when the maid ruined a favorite parasol. But what lady will have the heart to blame her for this? Not Mrs. Batcheller, who assures us that she herself would have spoken much more harshly under the circumstances. Subsequently, the same offending maid was lost, just as the party was preparing to board a train. Eulalia displayed on that occasion a truly royal readiness of decision: "Let us go. I am sure she will have the sense to come on later."

At Granada the incognito was lifted, and the author knew the bliss of being pressed into service as a lady in waiting. The trip henceforth assumes an official character. At Jerez, Eulalia had an enviable experience. It seems that one wine merchant of that city has the custom of dedicating a cask of sherry to each member of the royal family at birth. The infanta must needs drink out of her especial cask, although had she still been incognito she would have preferred her Lipton's. But how confront her with the compromising date, 1864, which that cask all too plainly bore? Spanish gallantry was not at a loss. The 6 was inverted, and at a stroke Eulalia was rejuvenated by thirty years. But how the wine must have suffered!

Later the pilgrims reached Lisbon and were royally entertained by King Manuel and his family; F. B. also received an invitation. The year was 1910, and nobody dreamed of the wretched republic which the future had in store. The author found King Manuel most sympathetic. Lisbon was only a foretaste of what was to come in Madrid. Eulalia hurried away to Paris. Would one believe it? She was soon to become a grandmother. But she remembered her American friends with numerous letters of introduction, which admitted them into the innermost penetralia of Madrid society. The author had many opportunities to meet King Alfonso, Queen Victoria, Dowager Queen Cristina, the Infanta Isabel, and others. Again, Mrs. Batcheller's impressions of royalty were pleasant. Alfonso is not only King of Spain, but "King of Hearts to every Spaniard." He is handsome and robust. Cameras are not to be believed if they say the contrary. This admiration was reciprocated. Royalty repeatedly praises the author's books, her singing, her charities. One by one the great attached themselves to her chariot wheels. Each member of the courts of Lisbon and Madrid presented her with an autographed photograph. These are reproduced, together with fulsome compliments to the recipient, which sometimes accompanied them. As a narrative of successful lion-hunting, "Royal Spain of To-day" might well arouse the envy of a Roosevelt.

Besides the record of the automobile trip, the book contains detailed descriptions of the places visited and much historical information, some of it incorrect. The Spanish Republic followed the brief reign of Amadeo, and did not precede it, as stated. Deceased authors like Pascual de Gayangos, Juan Valero, Menendez y Pelayo, and Pereda should not be numbered among the living. The illustrations are profuse and beautiful. The cover is especially attractive. The design is taken from an old missal in the cathedral of Toledo.

The Granger Movement: A Study of Agricultural Organization and Its Political, Economical, and Social Manifestations, 1870-1880. (The Toppan Prize, 1910-1911.) By Solon Justus Buck. Cambridge: Harvard University Press.

The Granger Movement embraced several farmers' organizations, of which the Patrons of Husbandry, or the Grange, was only the oldest and most striking. The movement began at a time when much was said about the power of organized labor, and its rapid success rested on the belief that the agriculturists, if well organized, could dictate terms to other classes. The Patrons themselves disclaimed political purposes, but they were not able to separate themselves entirely from political matters. Probably their insistence on non-political activities weakened the order materially. Other organizations appeared which avowed an intention of righting farmers' wrongs by the ballot, and they had a rapid popularity. It took ten years for the movement to run its course, although it still survives, chiefly in the East, as a society to promote agriculture. It had a strong influence on the Farmers' Alliance, which arose in Texas about 1880 and spread throughout the South, and which found a parallel in the National Farmers' Alliance, a very powerful society in the Northwest, a few years later. These organizations kept alive the spirit of unrest until it passed into the Populist movement of 1892-1896. Its later history is known of all.

The movement is, in its nature, very complex. Several societies must be studied separately, State by State, each in several phases of activity. Dr. Buck has met this task with great industry and conscientiousness. He has left no side of the subject untouched, and he has sought minute facts in a multitude of difficult sources. His book is written according to the standards of our best academic schools. It is scholarly and scientific. If it is, meanwhile, confused in presentation, one must remember the great difficulty an author would have to make a monograph on such a subject either interesting or vivacious. The subject demands, also, severe and impartial judgment. The Granger Movement in all its phases was the centre of bitter controversy. City dailies and the East generally derided it and denounced its purposes. The farmers viewed their opponents with suspicion and made exaggerated charges. Between these warring sides the historian must draw the fair line of truth. To draw such a line is not an easy thing in this day, when present politics are concerned with the conduct of railways, Trusts, and capitalists generally. In this respect the author deserves all praise. He is not without sympathy for the farmers, but he discusses their position dispassionately. He does not countenance the assaults on the capitalists. The movement is treated impersonally and with due sense of the trend of the age towards a larger social control of the means of production.

Three features of the monograph demand special mention. The first chapter is a good summary of rural conditions in the North and West in 1870, and it must prove very useful to students of social history. Chapter vii, Business Co-operation, is a valuable study of what is, possibly, the largest, and for a time the most successful, experiment in co-operation in our history. How great the experiment was may be seen from the fact that in Iowa alone in 1873 the Grange did business amounting to $5,000,000, and contended that in doing so there was a saving of 15 per cent. on family supplies purchased and 20 per cent. on agricultural implements. These results were so satisfactory to the Grange that it went into manufacturing, and became bankrupt. And there appeared the weakness of coöperative business; for no sooner did the tide run the wrong way than the farmers dropped the enterprise; and it was not possible to raise $25,000 in stock in order to put the State agency on a safe basis. Another good feature of the book is the wealth of bibliographical material to which the student is referred. It embraces public documents, State and national, a large number of local agricultural papers, and many secondary works. Such material must be useful for any one interested in the history of our rural classes.

Chicago and the Old Northwest, 1673-1835: A Study of the Evolution of the Northwestern Frontier with a History of Fort Dearborn. By Milo Milton Quaife, Ph.D. Chicago: The University of Chicago Press. $4 net.

The title of the volume is misleading, for Mr. Quaife has in reality written a monograph on the first Fort Dearborn and the Chicago Massacre of 1812, and has added to this a sketchy prologue of the preceding century and a half and an epilogue in better proportions to bring the history of Chicago down to 1835. Since the value of the work depends on his study of the history of the first Fort Dearborn, which occupies with the appendices two hundred and five pages of the four hundred and thirty-six pages of narrative, consideration should be first of all given to this part.

In this monograph we have one of the most careful studies in Western history that have ever been made. To the solution of the difficult problems, Mr. Quaife has brought a mind well equipped and has proved himself an indefatigable seeker of sources. Besides possessing patience, he has proved himself an impartial critic well trained in the theory and practice of his science. His essay is the first critical study of the most romantic episode in the history of Chicago. One interesting account of this massacre is, of course, well known—that written by Mrs. Kinzie, a connection by marriage of one of the important actors in the event. Naturally enough, Mrs. Kinzie drew her husband's ancestor as an heroic figure and depicted those opposed to him as weak. So important has the narrative of Wau Bun been in the historiography of Chicago that Mr. Quaife felt obliged to make a most careful examination of its trustworthiness, and his conclusions, which are printed in Appendix ii, where all the sources are critically estimated, are as follows:

> The evident inability of the author to state the facts correctly is manifest throughout the work. It abounds in details that could not possibly have been remembered by Mrs. Kinzie's informants; in others that could not have been known to them; and in still others that could never have occurred. Undaunted by the absence of records, Mrs. Kinzie repeats speeches and dialogues verbatim, as she, apparently, conceived they should have been recited.

Mr. Quaife has been able to reconstruct the story of the massacre by patching together the scraps of information from other sources. For the first time the action of Capt. Heald in evacuating the fort and destroying the arms is proved to have been justified. He was acting in accordance with Gen. Hull's order, which left him no discretion in the matter; and Mr. Quaife has demonstrated that Capt. Heald behaved throughout the whole affair in a manner befitting an officer. The important passage of Hull's order reads, in a more precise form than that given by Mr. Quaife, as follows: "It is with regret I order the Evacuation of your Post owing to the want of Provisions, only a neglect of the Commandant of Detroit [?]. You will therefore Dest[roy] [?] all arms & amunition, but the Goods of the Factory you may give to the Friendly Indians who may be desirous of Escorting you on to Fort Wayne & to the Poor & needy of your Post." This order was responsible for the later disaster. When the garrison and citizens with their wives and children had passed out of the fort, they were attacked by a powerful body of Indians, and there occurred the terrible massacre.

Kinzie, who has been almost universally upheld as the hero of the event, is here shown to have been a trader seeking his own interest. It may be that Mr. Quaife's sketch is not entirely free from bias, itself. For instance, there was no particular need of emphasizing the fact that John was in the habit of getting intoxicated, for in his day that particular form of indulgence was the most popular pleasure among gentlemen. Mr. Quaife also writes: "During these years (close of the eighteenth century) Kinzie was, of course, in league with the enemies of the United States,' whereas a more proper statement would be that Kinzie was at the time a citizen of Great Britain. Yet Mr. Quaife makes no use of certain doubtful testimony which points to Kinzie's serving the British during the War of 1812, although a possible case might have been made against him.

A few minor criticisms may be passed on this part of the volume. The author has shown carelessness in small details. In his transcription of Heald's letter, which is also given in facsimile, he creates a paragraph where there is none; and fails to show that the word which he evidently is correct in deciphering as "destroy," a reading most important for his interpretation of the whole episode, is not clear and is at least open to question. In some cases he makes a probable assertion, and then uses it later as a proved fact, as when he guesses—for it is nothing more than a guess—that a Mr. Tanner was assisted at the Chicago portage by a Frenchman named Ouilmette, and then later uses this possible episode as a proof of Ouilmette's goodness of heart. Another kind of mistake is due to his lack of knowledge of the general conditions in the West, and an illustration is found in the case of the characterization of this same early Chicago citizen, Ouilmette, who is said to have been "possessed of more thrift than the typical frontier French habitant of this period." With a wider knowledge of the French habitant in Missouri and elsewhere, he would not have made such a comparison.

The epilogue of this monograph is a running sketch of Chicago down to 1835. This part requires little attention from the reviewer, as it is in general acceptable, although Mr. Quaife does not write here as a master. One chapter deals with the fur trade, and is a good example of the author's excellence and limitation as an historian. When he treats of the factory system of the United States, particularly in its Chicago aspects, he is on the firm ground of his own knowledge, but his lack of special knowledge of the trade as carried on by the Canadian and St. Louis fur companies is painfully evident.

The prologue should never have been attempted. In only one of the five chapters, which, to paraphrase a classical saying, are too short for a treatise and too long for an introduction, could Mr. Quaife qualify as a specialist. In these he runs over a long period of Northwestern history, using a few well-known but not always authoritative books as his guide, and one wonders whether his errors of omission or commission are the more numerous. Imagine a history of the Old Northwest which skips nimbly over the period of British occupation in two pages and a half!

The first chapter of the prologue is devoted to the history of the Chicago portage. Here Mr. Quaife did have special knowledge, for he was employed as expert historian by the defendants in a lawsuit over the question of the navigability of the Desplaines River, which was regularly used by the fur traders for one hundred and fifty years in passing from Lake Michigan to the Illinois and Mississippi Rivers. The chapter shows the result. He has written a brief for the defendants, and the style employed is that of a brief. Like a lawyer, he has suppressed important information and magnified less important, so that he makes out a very pretty case; but it isn't history.

Notes

The Index of the Nation, July 1 to December 31, will be printed with the issue of January 1.

Announcement is made by Henry Holt of "Leaders to Our Western Sea, a Story of the Growth of These United States from the Alleghenies to the Pacific," by Frederick Samuel Dellenbaugh, explorer and artist.

G. E. Stechert & Company announce for publication in January a Life of President G. Stanley Hall, of Clark University, prepared by Dr. Louis N. Wilson. The book will be illustrated and will contain a complete bibliography of Dr. Hall's published works. Dr. Wilson has been associated with President Hall since the foundation of Clark University, and dedicates the book to the alumni.

Prof. Leo Wiener's translation from the German of "The Education of Karl Witte" will be published by Crowell at an early date.

In January Houghton Mifflin will bring out "In Freedom's Birthplace," a work by John Daniels, dealing with the development of the negro in Boston. Somewhat later in the year the same house promises Mary Heaton Vorse's "The Heart's Country."

The Medici Society announces the publication of the third and final volume of the Riccardi Press "Canterbury Tales."

A number of religious book are in preparation by Longmans, Green & Co., among them the following: "The Life in Grace," by the Rev. W. J. Carey; "Paradise, a Course of Addresses on the State of the Faithful Departed," by Canon E. E. Holmes; "Pastor Futurus," by the Rev. Dr. John Huntley Skrine; "God's Coöperative Society," by the Rev. Charles L. Marson, and "Thesaurus Fidelium," compiled by Carmelite Tertiary.

In the second portion of the library of the late Edward Dowden, which was put up at auction last week, were several interesting items. There was the "Polimanteia," 1595, which contains the second known mention of Shakespeare. It is a unique copy containing the author's name in full, William Covell, and not William Clerke, as usually supposed. There were also contemporary manuscripts of Donne's poems, and some of his sermons, and the original proof-sheets of De Quincey's essay on "The English Mail Coach."

Mr. Arnold Haultain, who as literary executor is preparing a second series of Goldwin Smith's letters, will be grateful for the use of any letters by Smith which were not included in the first series published last spring. Communications addressed care of the Bank of Montreal, No. 47 Threadneedle Street, London, E. C., will be gratefully acknowledged.

To the new edition of Thomas Hardy's works, Harpers have added a volume of short stories which have not hitherto been collected in book form. While these tales naturally do not represent the great Hardy of "The Return of the Native" and "Tess," they are well worth preserving.

If for nothing else one might read through Prof. John MacCunn's "Political Philosophy of Burke" (Longmans) for the succession of splendid quotations; and, indeed, their number and richness may bring some little surprise even to the reader who accounts himself pretty familiar with his Burke. Professor MacCunn's own style is, naturally, not of the ornate character of Burke's, but it is a genuine and refined style and offers an admirable setting for the quotations. The book, however, is no mere collection of striking passages. Professor MacCunn uses these rather as the structure of an admirable exposition of Burke's ideas. He has a profound respect for his author, and by nature, it is evident, a deep sympathy with the philosophy of the "Reflections," the "Appeal," etc., but at the end, when he summarizes the subject and shows Burke's relation to, and value for, the present, he writes and criticises as one thoroughly immersed in the current conceptions of democracy. The final point at issue is Burke's theory of a "natural aristocracy," which he accepts, and Burke's feeling that the only way to make sure of the existence of such an aristocracy is through the controlling power of prescriptive rights, with which feeling he totally disagrees. To discuss the issue as thus raised by Professor MacCunn would take us too far afield for our present purposes. We may only indicate two points which he neglects and which, to some readers at least, will seem of vital importance. He is aware of a certain conflict between Burke's profound sympathy for the lower strata of society and an insistence on the exclusion of them from the active body politic. But he does not explain how this conflict arises in part from the fact that Burke's philosophy, implicitly at least, is based on the seventeenth-century distrust of human nature, while in some ways he was deeply influenced by the eighteenth-century trend of humanitarianism. Still more vital is Professor MacCunn's failure to exhibit the character of the "natural aristocracy," which, as he thinks, must arise from the general prevalence of democracy. His theory calls for a very different meaning for the word "aristocracy" from that which it had in Burke's vocabulary, yet he does not explain this difference.

A large amount of labor has gone into the making of "The Book of the Epic, the World's Great Epics Told in Story" (Lippincott), by H. A. Guerber. The author has given summaries not only of the main epics of western Europe, but of Balkan, Persian, Indian, Japanese, and Chinese works, together with brief facts of literary history. For the summaries alone, undistinguished as their style is, many a student will be grateful; they should serve as a most convenient work of reference. Take, for example, such a complicated and, it must be confessed, often confused poem as "The Faërie Queene." Even the few mortals now living who have read it through cannot hope to keep the order of its incidents clearly in mind, and without the help of a detailed résumé might require no small amount of time trying to discover some desired portion. The introductions furnished by Mr. Guerber will be read with caution. Because of the necessity of compressed statement he has had at times to generalize without qualifications in matters which are extremely complex and indeed doubtful. In certain cases he has accepted unfounded rumors, as when he states dogmatically that Tasso was imprisoned solely because of his love for the sister of the Duke of Ferrara. Elsewhere he espouses a mere theory, asserting, for instance, that "Beowulf" was composed in Sweden and later reworked in England. Speaking of the origins of Arthurian romance, he implies that Gildas and Nennius collaborated. In general the author furnishes dates, but it would have been well if he had done so in connection with all the works and authors mentioned. He might also, to advantage, have drawn up a bibliography of the approved books of very general compass bearing on his subject.

To most readers Elizabeth Berkeley, wife of the sixth Lord Craven and afterwards of the Margrave of Anspach, is known as the friend of Horace Walpole whose eccentricities at once annoyed and amused that loyal correspondent. If her portraits do not flatter, she was indeed "The Beautiful Lady Craven," as A. M. Broadley and Lewis Melville entitle their new book (Lane); and if her original memoirs told the truth, as they most emphatically do not, she was an innocent and much-abused creature. The "Autobiographical Memoirs" were first published in 1826, when the author, then the Margravine of Anspach, was in her seventy-sixth year. She had been sent away by her first husband, Lord Craven, for reasons good and sufficient; she had wandered over Europe with various friends and protectors; had conquered the Margrave and after the death of his wife married him; and now, in the coolness of age, rich, and externally rehabilitated, she had settled down in England with the open attempt to win her way back into proper English society. She succeeded in getting about her a brilliant if somewhat miscellaneous circle, despite the coldness of her kinswoman, Queen Charlotte. The most amusing feature of the present publication is the contrast between the facts of her life as narrated by Messrs. Broadley and Melville in the long introduction which occupies half of the first volume, and the romance of her life as she paints it. She was herself not an ill writer, though without brilliance, and her memoirs have a certain historical value in their presentation of men and places of the day, for her chief instrument of falsification was the simple expedient of leaving things out. The editors have added footnotes which considerably enhance the value of the work. There are also many illustrations, derived in part from Mr. Broadley's great collection of manuscripts and prints of the period.

No fearsome man would attack such a subject as "American Ideals, Character, and Life" (Macmillan). Possibly Mr. Hamilton Wright Mabie would not have attacked it if he had not been appointed the first exchange lecturer from the United States on the Carnegie Peace Endowment. He wished to do for our country what Dr. Inazo Nitobe did for Japan in "The Japanese Nation: Its Land and Its People," a series of lectures delivered in this country on the same foundation. This book of Mr. Mabie's is of course the series of lectures he delivered, chiefly before university audiences, in Japan. To do this subject justice one should possess not only wide and accurate information, but unusual powers of insight and analysis. The author's long connection with a well-known periodical has made him familiar with several sides of American life, but it does not appear to have singularly endowed him with the critical powers just mentioned. His attempt "to sketch with a free hand and in large outline the development of the American people" does not result in a very illuminating interpretation of the American spirit. Three whole chapters are devoted to the course of our literature. As a history, they are too short. As an explanation of present America, they are not so written as to reveal our heart and soul. The writer's familiarity with the field has led him astray from the purpose of the lectures. Political America, on the other hand, which, for a Japanese audience, one would suppose the most interesting and significant feature of our national life, the feature best fitted to exemplify the American ideal, is confined to one short chapter of general description. Our industrial activity, which is surely in some respects typical and unique, receives only sporadic consideration. One feature of American ideals Mr. Mabie has emphasized not unduly—our interest in education, the pervading belief in its efficacy from colonial times. So far as the book has a central conviction, this side of our idealism supplies it.

Mr. Mabie declares that his addresses were delivered to audiences "of unusual intellectual alertness." It will take a similar reading public to follow with interest the printed form. The statement of ideas is prevailingly abstract and general. Concrete details and illustrative examples are consistently omitted. No contentious judgments or sharp outlines for the mind to hang to, no color or imagery to stick in the memory, are employed in explaining what is one of the most intangible of subjects—the nature and controlling spirit of a vast people.

Henry Bradley adds to the "Oxford English Dictionary" the section SEVERAL—SHASTER (Clarendon Press). Therein is an article running above eighteen columns on the unruly verb "shall," which goes far towards justifying the Dogberryian dictum that "to be a well-favoured man is the gift of fortune, but to write and read comes by nature." "Not one Londoner in a million," wrote the accurate Macaulay in 1837, "ever misplaces his will and shall." Oh, to have descended from a pure line of Cockneys! "Perhaps no Scot," says the Daily News in 1891, "ever yet mastered his 'shalls' and 'wills.'" In certain cases "shall" is sternly proclaimed a shibboleth. "In the first person, shall has, from the early Middle English period, been the normal auxiliary for expressing mere futurity. . . . (To use will in these cases is now a mark of Scottish, Irish, provincial, or extra-British idiom.)" In the history of certain other cases, however, there is consolatory matter for dwellers in the provinces and men of Scotch-Irish extraction; there are precedents various enough to make even the infallible Londoner sigh for the iron dogma of the schoolmaster. From a literary standpoint the most interesting discussion in this section is on the word "shard-born" or "shard-borne" in "Macbeth," III, ii, 42. Tollet in the eighteenth century said that this epithet of the drowsy-humming beetle meant "born in dung," but his interpretation has been generally rejected in favor of the explanation that "shard" means the "hard wing cases" on which the beetle is "borne," and the editors of the Clarendon Press Shakespeare, for example, say that Tollet's reading is "unquestionably wrong." Mr. Bradley, with the support of fresh instances of "shard" meaning "dung," maintains that Tollet was unquestionably right. If the Tollet-Bradley interpretation stands, posterity, reading in entomological works or in the "Hiawatha" of Longfellow of the beetle's "shining shards," will be entitled to a learned smile.

Some of the "low" words from this hemisphere will bear more investigation than they are receiving. Americans who have heard all their lives the word "shack"—a rough cabin or shanty—will be surprised to find the first recorded example dated 1881 (New York Times). "Shack"—meaning "to go after, as a ball batted to a distance"—is explained and illustrated only by definitions taken from two American dictionaries. To the writer of this note, "shag" would more accurately represent the sound heard on the "diamond" in the cry, "Shag it!" He is familiar, too, with an unnoticed intransitive use of the word, as, for example, in "Let us shag into town"—meaning to go on foot.

Mr. Bradley traces the word "shark" from the year 1569, when Sir John Hawkins's men brought one of the tribe to London, and he duly illustrates the figurative senses in such phrases as "loan shark," "land shark," etc. But he entirely overlooks the admired and rehabilitated "shark" known to the American college world: primarily, the student who devours and digests learning with ease (not to be confused with the successful "grind"), and, secondarily, one who excels in any line of activity. With his mind fixed on the notion that a figurative "shark" is a fraudulent rascal, what would an Oxford editor make of our college stories? Cf. Richard Holbrook in "Stories of the Colleges," 1901, p. 94: "'H'm,' laughed Jarvis, 'you're a real shark'"; also, Williams College "Class Book," 1903, p. 29; "'Dido' is a Math. shark of the first water."

On no account should "A Leisurely Tour in England" (Macmillan) be opened at the first page of chapter i, and thence perused conscientiously from cover to cover. The method of reading should be modelled on the sketch map of the author's tour, in which the red line that marks his progress has neither beginning nor end; that is to say, the book should be picked up in a leisurely hour, opened at random, and read for so long as leisure and inclination serve. The author, James John Hissey, has a fair list of books to his credit, all dealing with the same subject, tours of England undertaken with the assistance of various kinds of vehicles. The means of progression chosen for the purposes of the present volume was a small automobile, which, as Mr. Hissey sagely remarks, "is an excellent servant, though in truth a bad master," and each day's journey was made without any definite end in view. His tour took him from Eastbourne on the south coast of England to Aberdovey on the west coast of Wales. He avoided large towns, travelled generally along by-roads, stopped for contemplation or conversation, and made detours whenever the spirit moved him, and at the end of the day noted down in gossipy style what he had seen and done and heard. With but little alteration the present volume, of nearly 400 pages, consists of these notes, illustrated with photographs and sketches by the author. It is a very pleasant book to read, full of the author's personality and prejudices. There is a genuine love for beautiful scenery and beautiful architecture; above all, for what is old and mellowed. Mr. Hissey avows himself "no politician," but it is a safe guess that never in his life has he voted for other than a Tory candidate of the truest blue, for the sight of a disused windmill instantly impresses him with the desirability of putting a tax on flour. One point in the narrative should be noted for especial gratitude: the automobile in which the tour was made is kept severely in its place as a means of progression only, and is not allowed, in the modern fashion, to obtrude itself as a character in the story.

The Selden Society, acting upon its recently declared purpose of issuing yearly when practicable an extra volume supplementing the regular series of the Year Books, has sent to its members two numbers for the year 1913 (London: Quaritch). The first of these, Vol. XXVIII, contains select Charters of Trading Companies, the other, Vol. XXIX, the Eyre of Kent, 6 and 7 Edward II, volume three. The volume of select charters has the text of forty-one grants to companies, ranging in date from 1530 to 1707, all of which are to be found upon the Patent Rolls in the Public Record Office. These grants include incorporations of merchants trading abroad, of companies for plantation, mining, fishing, insurance, and water supply, and for the manufacture of starch, soap, salt, saltpetre, paper, linen, tapestry, and silk. Thus the volume can be used as a kind of documentary appendix to Scott's "Joint Stock Companies to 1720." The editor, Cecil T. Carr, has contributed a useful introduction, the most novel feature of which is the close relation revealed between the trading companies, as joint stock undertakings, and the gilds and municipalities of earlier times. As the trading company which crossed the water, with its charter and a majority of its governing body, and settled the colony of Massachusetts was an incorporated joint stock organization, it is evident that many of the institutional features of early New England history were derived from the customs and practices of the mediæval gilds of England. Mr. Carr is not the first to point out this connection, for others have suggested the probability of such an origin, basing their belief upon points of resemblance and other matters of internal evidence. But he is the first to show the continuity of the connection from the liveries of London, through the corporation of the Merchant Adventurers, to the trading company, and thence to the companies for plantation in Virginia, Bermuda, Massachusetts, and Old Providence.

The new volume of the Year Books is the eighth in the general series, and the third of the Eyre of 1313-1314. It continues the volumes issued in 1909 and 1912, by adding the reports of civil actions under the remaining titles alphabetically arranged from Mortdancestor to Variance. After an analysis of the cases in the volume, the editor, William C. Bolland, discusses at some length in his introduction the important light which one of the cases throws on a cryptic remark of Glanville's to the effect that the assize of Mortdancestor did not lie in respect of burgage tenure because of another assize which governed such lands and tenements. This assize, which Pollock and Maitland could only guess might "still be lurking in the archives of our boroughs," Mr. Bolland has discovered, though he is still unable to write its history. It is the assize of Fresh Force. Curiously enough, the name borne by this writ had no equivalent in French or Latin, being written "Fresheforce" in the one and "Frisca Forcia" in the other, in this respect differing from other writs in English law. Other cases in the volume furnish many interesting, if somewhat trivial, details of value for social history. Such, for example, is the item that a hare was valued at but half the amount of a rabbit, or to be more accurate a cony, as the term "rabbit" up to the early years of the seventeenth century was confined to the young of the cony. The cheaper rate at which the hare was held was undoubtedly due to the dislike felt by the richer classes for the hare as an article of food and to their preference for the flesh of the cony. Burton in his "Anatomy of Melancholy" bears witness to this dislike when he characterizes the hare as "black meat, melancholy, and hard of digestion," breeding when eaten an "incubus," and causing "fearful dreams." As other mediæval writers testify to the same belief, it would be interesting to know whence such a remarkable view of the gastronomic effects of eating hare's meat arose.

Capt. Henry Francis Brownson, soldier, author, and lawyer, formerly of New York city, died at his home in Detroit, on Friday. He was born at Canton, Mass., in 1835. He was graduated from Holy Cross College, Worcester, Mass., and was admitted to the bar in 1856. Previously he had studied in Paris and at the University of Munich. For gallant service in the battle of Malvern Hill he received the brevet of captain. Capt. Brownson was the translator of "Love of Mary" from the Italian; of Balmes's "Fundamental Philosophy" from the Spanish, and Tarducci's "Life of Columbus" from the Italian. He was the author of "Religion of Ancient Craft Masonry," "Faith and Science," and "Equality and Democracy."

The Rev. Thomas Kingsmill Abbott, librarian of Trinity College, Dublin, and a noted scholar and writer, died in that city on Thursday of last week. He was born in Dublin in 1829, and was educated at Trinity College, where he was professor of moral philosophy, 1867-72, of Biblical Greek, 1875-88, and of Hebrew, 1879-1900. He wrote many books, both scientific and religious, among them being "Elementary Theory of the Tides," "Do This in Remembrance of Me," and "Sight and Touch: An Attempt to Disprove the Berkeleian Theory of Vision."

Aristarchus of Samos, the Ancient Copernicus: A History of Greek Astronomy to Aristarchus, together with Aristarchus's Treatise on the sizes and distances of the sun and moon. A new Greek text, with translation and notes. By Sir Thomas Heath, K.C.B., F.R.S., sometime Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge. New York: The Oxford University Press.

This admirable piece of work makes the classic writings of Aristarchus accessible for the first time in English, following by many years the new editions of Cleomedes, Geminus, Simplicius, and others in the galaxy of the Greek astronomers. Sir Thomas Heath connects the origin of his book with an expressed desire of his old school-fellow, Professor Turner, now Savilian Professor at Oxford, whose interest in Aristarchus we can well understand was greatly enhanced because an early predecessor in the Savilian chairs, John Wallis, had in the latter part of the seventeenth century the honor of bringing out the editio princeps of the Greek text of this author. It is not, however, this text on which the present translation is based, but on the oldest and by far the best of all the ancient MSS., bearing the date of the tenth century, and known to scholars as Vaticanus Græcus 204. On a photograph of this beautiful MS. Sir Thomas has mainly relied, because "it seems to be the ultimate source of all the others, and so much superior that the others can practically be left out of account." An entire chapter is devoted to the history of text and editions, and Sir Thomas Heath is no novice in these lines, having previously done, among other editions, the works of Archimedes (1897) and Apollonius of Perga (conic sections).

Prefatory to the Greek text and his vis-à-vis translation, Sir Thomas has given an extended and luminous presentation of the cosmology of the Greeks, beginning with the pseudo-mythical astronomy of Homer and Hesiod, wherein celestial recurrences regulated the affairs of life; and Thales of Miletus, with whom the history of Greek astronomy properly commenced. This is followed by critical estimates of the brilliant but erroneous philosophy of Anaximander, who nevertheless drew the first map of the inhabited earth; of Anaximenes and his unique conception of the stars fixed upon a crystal sphere as in a frame; of Pythagoras and the spherical earth at the centre of all things, the planetary motions being independent; of the crude speculations of Xenophanes of Colophon, and the childish notions of Heraclitus of Ephesus; of the startling innovations of Parmenides and his flaming wreaths; of Anaxagoras of Clazomenæ, the first to promulgate the true doctrine of the moon, its phases, and eclipses; of Empedocles of Agrigentum and his theory of the motion of light; of the abandonment of the geocentric hypothesis by the Pythagoreans, Philolaus in especial, and the reduction of the earth to the status of a planet like all the others known to the ancients out to Saturn, as elaborated by Schiaparelli in his "I Precursori di Copernico nell' Antichità," together with a discussion of their fancied harmonies of the spheres. The Atomists follow, especially Democritus of Abdera, whose astronomy, although himself an able mathematician, was so weak as scarcely to be able to stand by itself; then Œnopides of Chios, who discovered the obliquity of the ecliptic; Plato, whose idealistic system as set forth in the "Timæus" is analyzed, with a presentation of the elusive system of the "Republic," which is blended with myth and only in the remotest sense helpful to modern astronomical theory or conception; Eudoxus of Cnidus and his theory of concentric spheres elaborated by Calippus of Cyzicus; and Aristotle, who attempted to render this conception practicable, but with whom the number of concentric spheres grew to something in excess of four dozen without the mechanical absurdity appearing to trouble any one.

Plato and the all-embracing cosmic philosophy of Aristotle are set forth at great length, and no less the conceptions of Heraclides of Pontus, the first to maintain that the earth turns round on its axis daily, and that both Mercury and Venus travel round the sun as a centre—the same Heraclides for whom Schiaparelli sought to claim anticipation of the heliocentric theory really due to Aristarchus Gruppe, too, was guilty of a somewhat flighty attempt to set up Plato as precursor of Copernicus.

Coming now to Aristarchus, we find him a pupil of Strato, the disciple and successor of Theophrastus. Observations by him, quoted by Ptolemy, show him to have been an elder contemporary of Archimedes (B. C. 287-212). Indeed, it is in the "Psammites," or "sand-reckoner," of Archimedes, a strange treatise in which he sets a superior limit to the number of grains of sand it would take to fill the universe, that we find the only extant account of the heliocentric theory of Aristarchus, save, perhaps, a reference or two in the "Doxographi Græci" and another in Plutarch's "De Facie in Orbe Lunæ."

While it is accepted as an undoubted historic fact that Aristarchus originated the idea of the earth's annual motion round the sun, his hypothesis cannot have received much recognition; indeed, but one philosopher, a century later, Seleucus of Babylon, appears to have taught this theory, in combination with that of the earth's turning round on its axis once each day. And its simple truth appears to have been disregarded for seventeen centuries for very sufficient reasons. In the first place, Hipparchus, contemporary of Seleucus and successor of Aristarchus, who is often called the father of observational astronomy, reverted to the earth-centred system; and he was followed by Ptolemy, whose "Almagest," based in large part on the observations of Hipparchus, became the acknowledged astronomical Bible of the centuries. So the weight of these great names sealed the fate of the heliocentric system; likewise of its author, who was the last astronomer among the Greeks or any other nation to attempt seriously to ascertain the physically true system before Copernicus.

Besides this we must remember that the laws of natural philosophy were wholly undeveloped, and that the Ptolemaic tables of the celestial motions continued through the Dark Ages, and even later, to be competent to predict the positions of the heavenly bodies with about the same order of precision as it was possible to observe them in pretelescopic days.

But Aristarchus will possess equal interest for astronomers of every age because he made the first truly scientific attempt to solve the problem of the sun's distance; and his ingeniously simple method is strictly without error, although it led him to a highly erroneous conclusion. Aristarchus was keen enough to see that just at the moment of the moon's quartering, when she is exactly dichotomized, lines drawn from her centre to the centres of sun and earth must make an exact right angle with each other. In consequence of the moon's slow and stately motion round the earth, and the ragged character of her surface, a very practical difficulty arises in observing the precise time when this phase happens: a difficulty which is still very much of an obstacle. In working up the geometric proof, Aristarchus reaches the definite result that "the distance of the sun from the earth is greater than eighteen times, but less than twenty times, the distance of the moon from the earth." (Prop. vii, p. 377). Although we now know that the sun is, not 19, but 390, times farther away than the moon is, to Aristarchus must none the less be accorded the highest praise for this attempt, which failed then because the observational data on which it rests were necessarily crude and inexact. His style is thoroughly classic, and his demonstration is worked out with the utmost rigor which the Euclidean geometry permitted.

Sir Thomas Heath's book abounds in references to the ancient writers not only, but also to the modern literature on the philosophy of the Greeks, particularly in French and German, with helpful translations and quotations. But his book does not end with Aristarchus: he appends a chapter concerning improvements made by later Greek astronomers upon Aristarchus's estimates of sizes and distances, especially dealing with Eratosthenes and the first direct measurement of the earth's dimensions on scientific principles; and concerning those of Hipparchus, critically investigated by Hultsch, and of Posidonius of Rhodes, who, although a meteorologist, came vastly nearer the truth about the sun's distance than did any of his contemporaries.

Sir Thomas Heath's "Aristarchus" is provided with an ample and excellent index, and as a masterpiece of critical research and scholarly presentation leaves little for any future English student of the Greek astronomy to do.

Drama

Henry Holt & Co. hope to issue early in January "The Continental Drama of To-day, Outlines for its Study," by Barrett H. Clark.

The dramatic censorship in England is an institution that lends itself readily to ridicule, and in "Censorship in England" (London: Palmer), Frank Fowell and Frank Palmer have ridiculed it to the top of their bent. The book is written frankly from an ex-parte standpoint, but from the very violence of their antagonism to the censorship the authors have come near to spoiling their own case. Despite one's doubts of the institution, in reading these pages one is almost tempted to rise in defence of that much-abused individual, the censor. Only a confirmed cynic could believe that the gentlemen who have held that office in recent years have been so deplorably lost to sense of shame as the authors would give us to understand. Moreover, while cordially agreeing that the public is a more satisfactory censor of the drama than an autocratic individual of possibly blameless life, but of undistinguished intelligence, one suspects from many passages in this book that the reason why the authors wish the stage to be free and untrammelled is primarily in order that plays reflecting the particular aspect of feminism that has been unpleasantly conspicuous during the present theatrical season in New York may be exploited without let or hindrance. Another flaw in the book is the entirely gratuitous attacks upon religion and ministers of religion. We are told that the church has "consistently and indiscriminately denounced" the stage, a statement which, at the least, is altogether too sweeping; and that "if the church had produced an army of social workers and not talkers, such phases of that [the white slave] traffic as are curable would have been cured ten years ago," the fact being, of course, as is generally known, that the church has produced a very considerable army of social workers in this particular field.

Apart from blemishes of this kind and a general tendency to extravagance of statement, Mr. Fowell and Mr. Palmer have done their work well. Their research into the history of the office of Master of Revels, in which the censorship had its origin, has been extensive and conscientious; the story is well told, and its recital is enlivened by a number of racy anecdotes of censorial peculiarities. In more recent times the movement for the abolition of the office of censor is fully described; the proceedings of the Royal Commission of 1909 are carefully analyzed, and its findings given. The whole subject is more thorny than might at first sight appear, for the principle of the censorship has the support of the majority of theatrical managers, whose views are entitled to consideration. For them the licensing of a play is a guarantee that the performance will not subsequently be interfered with by the police. Hence the conclusion of the Commission, that application for a license should be optional, seems a reasonable compromise, and it is regrettable that no action has as yet been taken by Parliament to give effect to the recommendations of the Commission. Even so, however, the compromise would be at the best a pis aller. That the morals of Great Britain would not be seriously imperilled by abolishing the institution is, we agree with the authors, sufficiently proved by the fact that music halls in England, which do not enjoy the benefit of the censor's paternal supervision and are constrained only by public opinion exercised through the box office and the police, have improved in tone during the past thirty years quite disproportionately to the advance made by the legitimate theatre.

Mr. G. K. Chesterton rightly calls his "Magic" (Putnam) a fantastic comedy. This quality constitutes its chief merit as a bit of literary composition and its essential weakness as drama. Beginning in a strain of whimsy, it drifts into an apparently serious discussion among representatives of religious faith, scientific agnosticism, blatant materialism, speculative mysticism, and muddle-headed indifferentism—with hints of a possibly tragic issue—and finally ends with a transparent evasion which leaves the reader or spectator in complete doubt as to the intent of the play or the meaning of its author. The framework of the plot is fresh and ingenious and the dialogue full of point and sparkle. The arguments, pro and con, if containing nothing new, are exceedingly well put. An easy-going duke, of most elastic principles, has two wards, a niece, who believes in fairies, and a nephew, who has been educated in America, and believes in nothing but business facts. In the whole family there is a taint of insanity. To amuse the niece, the duke hires a conjurer, who poses before the young woman as a magician and is regarded by her as a supernatural being. The nephew ridicules the conjurer offensively, derides his tricks, and angers a scientific doctor and a clergyman by crude professions of atheism. Finally, the conjurer confounds the bumptious youth by changing a distant red light, the doctor's lamp, into a blue one, and the youth is so bewildered by the seeming miracle as to be in danger of permanent insanity. The doctor declares that his only chance of recovery lies in an explanation of the mystery. For a long time the conjurer refuses to give this because no one would believe him. Finally he confesses to the niece, with whom he is in love, that in his pursuit of spiritualistic studies he has unwittingly fallen into the power of evil spirits whose existence he had doubted, and that it was by their aid he had performed his trick. Manifestly, he says, it would do no good to tell the sick man such a story as that. He might have added that it was not a tale that would appeal to a modern audience in contemporaneous drama.

Mr. Chesterton evidently found himself confronted with a dramatic crux, of his own invention, beyond his ingenuity to solve. To dodge it, he makes his repentant conjurer, after prayer, discover a rational but untrue explanation of the phenomenon—which, however, is not given—whereby such senses as he had are restored to the raving youth and everybody is supposed to be satisfied. To crown all, the duke's niece takes the conjurer for her husband. It was scarcely worth while to elaborate so much pretentious debate as a preliminary to such a lame and impotent conclusion. The general implication seems to be that fraudulent imitations of miracles suggest the possibility of real ones, and that there may be more things in heaven and earth than are dreamed of in your philosophy. This on the surface is a tolerably safe proposition, but it does not get much support from a comedy like this, which is suggestive not only of fantasy but of insincerity. There can be no doubt that the conjurer, if he believed in them, ought to have stood by his demons. When he shuffled, the whole fabric of the drama, as drama, collapsed.

Mabel and Edith Taliaferro, under the management of Joseph Brooks, will appear in "Young Wisdom," a comedy by Rachel Crothers, at the Criterion Theatre on Monday, January 5, "The Man Inside" ending its run on January 3. This is their first season as joint stars. "Young Wisdom" is in three acts, and deals with some advanced ideas held by two young women.

Charles Frohman has decided upon Monday, January 5, for the commencement of Maude Adams's New York season. On that night, in the Empire Theatre, she will be seen for the first time in J. M. Barrie's "The Legend of Leonora," his first long play since "What Every Woman Knows."

The London Criterion Theatre company, headed by H. V. Esmond and Miss Eva Moore, will begin their season at the Garrick Theatre on Wednesday, January 7, presenting as their first piece a farcical comedy, "Eliza Comes to Stay," with the entire company which performed it at the Criterion Theatre, London. Mr. Esmond will act other plays while in New York. Probably his second will be "The Dear Fool." Miss Eva Moore (Mrs. Esmond) was formerly the leading lady of the St. James's Theatre, London, where, with George Alexander, she created important parts in many plays that were afterward seen in America. "The Dear Fool" had a recent trial in Edinburgh.

One of the most valuable gifts ever bestowed upon an actor is about to come upon the London market. This is the beautiful set of silver ornaments "Presented to Charles John Kean, F.S.A., by many of his fellow-Etonians, together with numerous friends and admirers among the public," on March 22, 1862. The presentation was made by Gladstone, then Chancellor of the Exchequer, at the St. James's Hall, Piccadilly. There are nine pieces of silver in all, the principal one being a large vase embellished with scenes from various Shakespearean plays produced by Kean at the Princess Theatre. Two other large pieces represent figures from "A Midsummer Night's Dream" and "The Tempest." The designs were made by H. H. Armstead, R.A. (1828-1905), and the trophy, which was valued at the time of presentation at 2,000 guineas, was executed by Hunt and Roskell.

Music

Memoirs of an American Prima Donna. By Clara Louise Kellogg. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.50 net.

"Too clever to sing well" is an expression attributed to Mme. Maeterlinck. Clara Louise Kellogg is convinced that there is truth in it as well as sarcasm. "Wonderful voices," she declares, "usually are given to people who are, intrinsically, more or less nonentities." She herself is obviously an exception; for until thirty years ago she was one of the most admired singers on the operatic stage, the leading European critic of her time, Dr. Hanslick, of Vienna, going so far as to call her "the only one to compare with Patti"; yet she has just given to the world a book of her reminiscences which indicates, among other things, that she owed her successes quite as much to her brains as to her voice. It is an interesting book, from cover to cover, presenting vivid pictures of life on the operatic stage of America and Europe from the year 1861, when she made her début in New York, to the time of her retirement from the stage, shortly after her marriage to her manager, Carl Strakosch, in 1887.

When she began her career, the belief was still current that America could not produce great voices or artists. The girl whose name is legion to-day—the girl who aspires professionally—was almost unknown at that time, and artists, instead of being lionized, were looked at askance. Miss Kellogg's difficulties were increased by the fact that she was regarded as an intruder by the Italians, who, up to that time, had had a monopoly of the operatic stage in America. "Who is she," they would say indignantly, "to come and take the bread out of our mouths?" Overcoming all these obstacles, she was acknowledged a full-fledged prima donna at the age of nineteen, and Europe soon endorsed her successes at home. "She has only one fault," wrote a London journalist: "If she were but English, she would be simply perfect.' The dreaded Chorley found her, though so young, "a thoroughly accomplished singer." He admired her perfect enunciation of the words, her graceful figure, her countenance full of intelligence, and the dramatic ability which she had displayed from the beginning—to such an extent, indeed, that Edwin Booth wanted her to give up singing and go on the dramatic stage, while John Wallack, Lester's father, after hearing her in "Fra Diavolo," exclaimed: "I wish to God that girl would lose her voice!"

Miss Kellogg, though of New England stock, happened to be born and brought up in South Carolina, and her first impressions were of negro music. She has not yet got over her love of the banjo, which fascinated her as a girl, and thinks it a thousand pities that the genuine negro minstrels, in whose performances were all the essence of slavery, and the efforts of the slaves to amuse themselves, have passed away. The first great prima donna she heard, when still an infant in arms, was Jenny Lind; she remembers the day clearly. Ere long she became one of the guild. The most interesting pages of her memoirs are those in which she gives pen pictures of the other great singers she was thrown with, among them Patti, Nilsson, Lucca, Titjiens, Ilma di Murska, Josephine de Reske, Sembrich, Marie Roze, Minnie Hauck, Cary, Nordica, Maurel, Faure, Santley. For Mme. Nordica her admiration was and is particularly great. "Her breathing and tone production are about as nearly perfect as any one's can be, and, if I wanted any young student to learn by imitation, I would say to her, 'Go and hear Nordica and do as nearly like her as you can.'" There is some exaggeration in what she says in her elaborate estimate of the voice and art of Patti (p. 130), concerning whom she remarks that "she has allowed herself few emotions. Every singer knows that emotions are what exhaust and injure the voice. She never acted; and she never, never felt."

Of particular interest is a chapter

on the royal concerts at Buckingham Palace for which Miss Kellogg was repeatedly engaged. She seems slyly to poke fun at the whole thing. It is rather surprising to find her not particularly enthusiastic over the Parisian theatres, which she thought "very limited and disappointing." She found the French "most obstinate, one-ideaed," especially when she was trying to force on them ideas of her own in acting French parts. An operatic manager said to her: "I think that Mademoiselle will make a mistake if she ever tries anything new!" Whatever the French may have thought of them, Miss Kellogg's ideas about the interpretation of the two most popular of all French operas, "Carmen" and "Faust," are among the best things in her book.

Music is by no means the sole theme of this entertaining volume. Miss Kellogg met many prominent men of letters, including the brilliant Boston galaxy in the days of Lowell, Holmes, and Longfellow, and she records some of their sayings. There are also reminiscences of war-time scenes, during which the opera that drew and aroused most enthusiasm was "The Daughter of the Regiment." One gets a vivid idea of life in Russia from her narrative of her own experiences in St. Petersburg. She had an interesting correspondence with a Japanese artist, some of whose letters she prints. But music is never out of sight for more than a page or two. She met some of the great composers, including Gounod and Verdi, with whom she once breakfasted. Among the actors she met was Henry Irving, who told her what he knew about music, which was not much. Her chapter on opera in English, which she was the first to attempt successfully, is of interest at the present moment.

The Schirmers have printed separately nine numbers (including the exquisite Madrigal) from Victor Herbert's latest comic operetta, "The Madcap Duchess." The same publishers have issued "Six Chansons Galantes" from the repertory of Maggie Teyte. They are selections from the comic operas of Grétry, Méhul, Isouard, Dalayrac, and Dezède.

The Imperial Opera in Vienna is spending $32,000 in staging "Parsifal."

A Venetian composer named Francesco Malepiero has received a prize for the best opera offered by Rome. Fifty-five manuscripts were submitted.

A "magnificent folly" is what a French critic calls the operatic venture at the Théâtre des Champs-Elysées. The manager made the mistake of supposing that because there was a temporary craze for Russian dancing and opera, there was a demand for a permanent company. The result showed average receipts of $400, while the expenses were $1,600 a night. The writer concludes that no opera is possible without a subvention. The Paris Grand Opéra and Opéra Comique get respectively $160,000 and $60,000, yet are kept going with the greatest difficulty. At the end of a recent season the Opéra authorities had to acknowledge a loss of $40,000.

Kingsley's "Westward Ho!" has been used as the basis of an English opera by the novelist, E. F. Benson, and the composer, Napier Miles. It was produced a few weeks ago by the opera class of the London Academy of Music. Speaking of his opera to Robin H. Legge, of the London Telegraph, Mr. Miles said:

> During the years in which I was composing the music of the opera, I spent many weeks in the old lighthouse cottage on the top of Lundy at the edge of the cliff, with no land to the west of me nearer than America, but with the Somerset, Devon, and Cornish coasts lying to the south, so that I hope that I have not only soaked myself in the atmosphere of the place, but been able to get some feeling of the sea, the sky, and the sunshine into the music; that, at least, was my aim.

Mr. Miles believes strongly in the folk-song movement, and he knows of at least two folksong operas in preparation.

THE WINTER ACADEMY.

The winter exhibition of the National Academy of Fine Arts is wonderfully well hung this year, and those of us who remember the crowded walls it displayed this time last year are more than satisfied with the improvement brought about by showing fewer works in a more dignified and impressive manner. It seems a pity, however, that a National Academy should be restricted for lack of room, and with each recurring exhibition the hope still springs that the apparently spasmodic and certainly oft-repeated agitation for better quarters will ultimately attain the desired result. That the efforts in this direction have so long been futile is surprising when it has been so easy in the opulent years of the last two decades to get liberal assistance from a generous public for almost any well-presented cause. The artists themselves are in all probability a great deal to blame for the slowness in bringing about the desired improvement, since many of them encourage the public to assume the attitude that the Academy is an antiquated affair that has outlived its usefulness and been supplanted by the one-man exhibition at the dealers and in the studios.

The age of the institution must be granted, but only as an unquestionable advantage and reason for its continuance, since in times past many artistic reputations have been established by it, and a good part of the history of American art is interwoven in the records of its annual exhibitions. And now, in spite of gibes and the tendency to regard the Academy as moribund, its passing could undoubtedly be stayed and its usefulness revived and extended if it were to have proper space for adequate exhibition. Its need seems to be—judging by similiar exhibitions in other countries—a large central room, or rooms, for sculpture, with many smaller ones adjoining; in these last could be shown, as one-man exhibitions, the work of established Academicians, who by their presence could confer honor upon the Academy and, at the same time, receive fresh recognition from the community. Moreover, this kind of exhibition does away with the jarring juxtaposition of the canvases of artists whose vision and interpretation are different or opposed; and also removes the temptation to speak in terms of paint more forcible than the occasion warrants, in order to be heard from the crowded Academy walls.

In the meantime, the present showing in the rooms sums up sixty-three Academicians, fifty-seven Associates, and two hundred and thirty-one non-members, which certainly indicates that for one reason or another members are not vitally interested this year.

Scanning these pictures with the recollection of the recent joyous recovery of a very famous picture fresh in mind, the query occurs to me: if one of these paintings should disappear would there be any deep emotion for the lost canvas? Could not a neighboring one take its place as well, or perchance the artist paint a duplicate without hesitation or ado? Which is, after all, no more than a way of acknowledging that Leonardos are rare at any period of the world's history, and that the work of these artists is not profoundly moving or specially necessary to any one's happiness. Nevertheless, though it may not widen the vision or give that exquisite pleasure that comes from the realization of independent thinking adequately expressed, the exhibition as a whole emphasizes how astonishingly well these finely trained, clever, and discriminating artists put themselves upon canvas.

Richard Miller's nude is a case somewhat in point. The white draperies on the chair, the deep opalescent colors of the robe of the standing figure, the reflections in the mirror, the jewel case, and the one bright red flower held against the black hair of the nude figure, combine to make an interesting color setting for the firmly modelled flesh with its pearly shadows and delicate pink tones; but beyond these qualities it does not go, and leaves the feeling that an artist who has the skill to compass so much should have the power to see and express far more.

Of course, all the subjects that usually appear in the exhibition are represented this year, and among them the marines are noticeably interesting. Ritschel's Rocks and Breakers (to which the Carnegie prize is awarded) is full of the power and sweep of the incoming tide in the deep waters of the Pacific Coast; Howard Russell Butler's glorious Day, Maine Coast, brings suggestion of the freshness and freedom of north-shore air and water; Hayler Lever is a new name that is brought to notice by the strong pure color and poor construction of his picture, entitled Smeaton Quay, St. Ives; Emile Carlsen's decorative Sky and Ocean gives the gentle roll of billows under the summer heavens. Childe Hassam's two pictures are of sea and shore in resplendent sunlight, with the interest of figures besides, but his Diana has taken a most uncomfortable pose as to her uplifted arms and a most firmly planted one as to her feet. It is hard to believe that she could ever extract herself from that pool.

Elsewhere there are not so many snow scenes as sometimes, and the excellence of those that do appear has no element of the unexpected in it, since this is the sort of thing Scofield and Redfield have done extraordinarily well before to-day. Redfield arrests and holds the attention more in his other picture —Between Daylight and Darkness— which shows a wide sweep of New York buildings, with myriads of electric lights shining forth across the mystery of a great city, in the fast settling gloom of approaching night.

Among the other landscapes there are many more than can be mentioned that deserve recognition for sincerity of purpose and honest study of nature; as, for example, William Coffin's two admirable pictures in which saturated atmosphere and cloud shadow on the drenched fields are simply and effectively shown. Bruce Crane manages to put poetry and simplicity into his landscapes, and there is a quiet sincerity about Van Laer's November Afternoon that brings the gaze back to it with increasing appreciation. On the other hand, Daniel Garber's more pretentious work does not grow in favor with greater familiarity; perchance there are mannerisms and repetitions that call for back-to-nature study as a necessity, even for romantic and semi-decorative landscape.

In a class by itself is the Waterfall, by John Sargent, loaned for this exhibition. The view of the frowning granite cliffs that he has painted with so much power and significance kindles the desire to see how he might interpret that elusive chasm of many moods and difficulties—the Grand Cañon of the Colorado.

In figures, there are the Indians by Couse, by Blumenschein, and by Sharp. The first seems over-sophisticated and sentimental; the second is a good decorative composition, with an attractive detail in the shape of a shy Indian child; and the third is not very interesting, and probably never would have been at all if Couse had not done it, or its like, first. Another figure that attracts in the way of disappointment is Hawthorne's Widow. The gloom of her bereavement has settled upon her garb and background and rendered them quite lifeless, while her eyes are dull with a far-away stare, not unfamiliar in Hawthorne's pictures.

The portraits of children by Lydia Field Emmet are finely executed. Especially The Good Little Girl pleases, with her innocent self-satisfaction, and the detachment of her figure from the background is an unobtrusive but extremely able piece of painting. Another portrait to be mentioned is that of Mrs. Irving Wiles, by her husband, which wins the Proctor prize, with easy, decided brushwork, good textures, rich blacks, and clear flesh tones and shadows.

In sculpture Paul Manship is the recipient of the Helen Foster Barnett prize, for his archaistic group, The Centaur and Dryad; and, incidentally, all of the nine small pieces he is now exhibiting are the subject of much comment for their originality and charm. This attention is but the renewal of the interest his work commanded last winter in the exhibition of the Architectural League, just after his return from his three years in Rome. His style is an odd mixture of freedom and conventionality. There is a largeness in his manner of handling a solidity, and thoroughness in his modelling, an elimination of non-essentials, and a consequent massiveness of appearance, that is very impressive. In spite of the smallness of his figures, they are more statuesque in effect than much larger forms of more complicated treatment. His freedom and his modernity are expressed in the important parts of his work—there he gives no hint of reversion to archaic forms; but in the details, of hair and ornaments, or in the setting of an eye that can only be seen in front view though the figure is in profile, he gives the archaistic touch, which may be a pose; but, if so, is an allowable one, and piquant, but is by no means vital for the real excellence of the work. The restraint and beauty of his vase—Greco-Egyptian in design and in decoration—is most admirable; the little figure of Spring Awakening is instinct with life and joy down to the very toes, and if the head, with its archaistic rings of hair and slanting eyes, offends, it could be knocked off, and still the figure would express gladness; and the Portrait Statuette might be a full-sized woman, it is so simple, dignified, and stately. The world seems all before this young sculptor, still somewhere under thirty-five, according to the terms of the Barnett prize, and we may see him doing yet greater things, for which he has the foundation well laid. At any rate, it may be noticed his work is not in any way influenced by Rodin—so long the young sculptor's aim and idol; rather, I should say, he is of that newer school of sculpture, more simplified and architectural in its tendencies and represented by Maillol, the Frenchman, and the semi-English Epstein. Chotscho: Facsimile-Wiedergaben der wichtigeren Funde der ersten königlich Preussischen Expedition nach Turfan in Ost-Turkistan. By A. von Le Coq. Berlin: Dietrich Reimer (Ernst Vohsen). 130 marks.

On the ground-floor of the Royal Ethnographical Museum at Berlin, just behind the Schliemann collection of Trojan antiquities, are now to be seen the original paintings, statuary, and some of the manuscripts which Professor von Le Coq brought with him from Chinese Turkestan. The present volume, handsomely illustrated with 75 plates, of which 45 are colored, deals especially with the most important mural paintings, the paintings on canvas and on silk, the lesser arts, and the excavated sites, whereas the manuscripts, of which there are more than thirty thousand, are publishing elsewhere.

In the introduction of eighteen pages our author sketches in a fascinating manner the history of the journey from Berlin to the Turfan Valley, and then gives, with illustrations and ground-plans, a description of the discovered sites. Of these, the most important is Chotscho, or Kucha, as the English write it, sometimes also called Idikutshari. After this introduction there follows a full-page description of each plate, in which the author only too seldom attempts an interpretation of the pictures. Indeed, he interprets only one of the large mural paintings (text to pl. 23), though many of the others certainly illustrate legends either of the predecessors of Gautama Buddha or of the god himself.

The first to excavate systematically in East Turkestan were the Russians, under Dr. Klementz, in 1898. Later Dr. Stein made excavations for the English at Khotan in the Tarim Basin, southwest of the Turfan oasis. During the winter of 1902 Professor Grünwedel and Dr. Huth made an expedition to the Turfan Valley and discovered a large sacred precinct of Buddhistic monasteries and temples at Idikutshari (Chotscho), dating from the ninth century of our era. Professor Grünwedel made plans of the buildings and drawings of the mural paintings, but he did not attempt to remove the pictures. The expedition of Professor von Le Coq, the chief results of which are published in the monumental work before us for review, covers a period of almost two years, 1904-1906, not counting the journey. Much of his time was spent in cutting the paintings from the walls and carefully packing them in boxes for exportation to Berlin, thus preserving forever what would otherwise have been soon destroyed. At present he is again excavating in northern Chinese Turkestan.

The earliest inhabitants of this country were probably of Iranian stock, though other Indo-Germanic tribes may have lived there. As it appears from the finds, their architecture, art, and religion did not come from China, but from Persia and India. Peaceably, side by side, there lived in the Turfan Valley Uighur Tartars, Buddhists from India and China, Nestorian Christians from Syria, and followers of the Persian Mani. About 700 A. D. Turkish-speaking Buddhists, the Uighuri, the first among the Turks to acquire a high grade of culture, are found in possession of the country. The influence of the Syrian Christians had already been felt in the seventh century, whereas in the middle of the eighth century the Manichæans were so influential that many of the Uighuri were converted to their religion. This brought renewed Persian influence into the land, and accounts for the strong influence of Persian miniature-painting seen in many of the pictures discovered by Professor von Le Coq. The Uighuri reached their zenith during the next hundred years. Their power was brought to a sudden close, according to our author, in 843. Later there was a partial restoration of Chotscho lasting until the end of the fourteenth century, when Islamism gave the final death-blow to this unique civilization. After that time it was no longer the meeting-place of nations and of tongues.

The mural paintings are in tempera on plaster or mud smeared over the adobe walls of the buildings. The figures, often life-size, were first sketched in outline. Occasionally a stencil was used, as in the Lamaistic art of to-day. Then the drapery and other details were painted with a bold stroke and the outlines retouched. Especially charming are the floral designs and tendrils that fill the field. The great skill shown in distributing the pictures over the wall-space at the disposal of the artist was evidently an antique inheritance. The grouping often reminds one of the Gandhara art of India. The subjects are altogether religious in nature.

Stone sculptures are rare and are found only in the shape of small pillars with reliefs of Buddha. The most common material was sun-dried mud, covered with a white slip and then painted or gilded. This material was used even for colossal statues of Buddha, standing, sitting, or reclining. The heads of the statues are usually made from moulds, many of which have actually been found. It is significant for the interpretation of the wall-paintings that the sculptures in a room are intended to form a part of the picture; thus the statue of Buddha often has its attendant figures painted on the wall.

The decorative sculptures and the paintings belong to the same period as the erection of the buildings, the oldest about 600 A. D., the youngest not later than 1400. These dates also hold for the movable objects, such as paintings on canvas and silk, the miniatures on paper from books, the wood-carvings and the objects in bronze, terracotta, and leather.

The colored plates in Professor von Le Coq's book are masterpieces of modern technique, and faithfully reproduce the originals. He is to be congratulated on this scholarly piece of work, which will serve as the basis for all future investigation along these lines. Perhaps the most valuable result of the German expedition is the discovery of the missing stepping-stone by which Græco-Indian art advanced across Asia to China and Japan.

Walter Hawley's "Oriental Rugs, Antique and Modern" (Lane) covers familiar ground, but with more thoroughness than any previous English work on the subject. When a book must treat the entire field from the earliest examples to the commercially made carpet of to-day, the distribution of space becomes difficult. It seems to us that Mr. Hawley has been judicious in this regard. The delightful Saracenic rugs, which are perhaps erroneously ascribed to Damascus, should have had something more than bare mention; more attention, too, might well have been given to saddle-bags and pillow mats. Doubtless such subjects were sacrificed to the need of classifying a great number of weaves. Mr. Hawley's peculiar contribution is a close analysis of the weave. Early connoisseurs have stood chiefly on the knotting and the pattern. Mr. Hawley shows very interestingly that discriminations otherwise difficult may readily be made by studying the relation of warp to weft as revealed by the back of the rug. It all depends upon the pulling of the double knot and the tension of the weft-yarns. If the weft be left loose, it encases the warp regularly like a tube; if the weft be drawn tight, the warp is drawn in at each crossing and virtually disappears. Each knot, whether Ghiordes or Sehna, is cast on two strands of warp, in what sailors would call hitches. According to the knotting, the two warp threads may lie parallel with the plane of the rug or one may be pulled up above the other. This produces characteristic effects on the back of the rug, and these habits of the loom are singularly persistent in given localities. This well-made book is in the large quarto form familiar through Mumford's classic work. There are eleven full-page color plates, beginning with the Ardebil carpet, and eighty half-tone cuts. Especially useful are the diagrammatic tables of typical border stripes of the various weaves. As a working treatise for collectors and rug-buyers generally, it seems to us the best now in the field.

Architects, designers, and interior decorators will welcome "Louis XVI Furniture" (Putnam), by Seymour De Ricci. It is said to be the first entire volume devoted to the so-called "antique" style, which in the later years of Louis XV abruptly supplanted the rococo manner, and which took its name from the succeeding monarch. The story of the evolution of the style is told in some 360 pictures, arranged in series so as first to show a number of complete interiors from Paris (including Versailles and Fontainebleau), the French provinces, Switzerland, and Germany; then isolated decorative panels, mantel pieces, and doors; and finally various individual pieces of furniture. A short introduction to the pictures indicates that the author is thoroughly sympathetic with the Louis XVI work and not very fond of the preceding rocaille. "A body of artistic conceptions," he writes, "based upon an absence of all symmetry had, in its very essence, something outrageous; such an excess of eccentricities, despite all the talent of its protagonists, Slodtz, Caffieri, and Meissonier, could not endure; it only lasted as long as it did thanks to the artisans whose prudence, when executing their work, considerably tempered the uncontrollable ardor of the designers." The nature of the reaction from rococo to neo-classicism is illustrated by several instructive citations from eighteenth-century documents not generally familiar. The book was printed at Stuttgart; it is not free from typographical errors.

Excavations are proceeding at Ostia under the direction of Prof. Dante Vaglieri with interesting results. On the site of the Forum and on the east side of the Temple of Vulcan the remains of shops constructed of tufa have been found, and at a lower level other shops of the oldest town of Ostia on this site have been detected. The wooden pavement of these buildings may be inferred from the charred remains of beams which are still preserved. Professor Vaglieri argues from this discovery that the shops which once stood in the Forum at Rome were also of wood and of similar construction. At present he is excavating a large building, also in the Forum, which it is hoped will prove to be the Basilica.

Finance

THE COUNTRY AND THE BANKING BILL.

Beginning a week ago to-day, after a fortnight of uncertainty and declining prices, the New York stock market suddenly began to rise. With the advance, activity in trading increased; at the beginning of this week, after the largest business in two months, prices of many important shares were up 5 points or more, and what Wall Street calls the "undertone" of the market seemed to be altogether changed. This reversal of form did not occur in response to anything in the financial news. The Wall Street money rate had, to be sure, declined; but as against this stood the week's signs of disturbance on the European stock exchanges.

The single overnight news development, between Wednesday's closing and the opening on Thursday, was the agreement of the Senate Democratic caucus, at Washington, on several changes in the Banking and Currency bill in line with conservative opinion. With the making of these changes it became evident that the bill was on its way to immediate enactment. During last week's rise on the Stock Exchange Wall Street ascribed the buying to this news.

Having gone to the conference committee of House and Senate—where further amendments of a conservative nature were incorporated—the bill is now a law. It will presently be in active operation, and the certainty of the early introduction of the new banking and currency machinery makes it important now to ask, What will be its longer effect on the finances of the country? The Wall Street market may have risen because it believed that the "rediscounting plan" would relieve our money tension; or because an irritating uncertainty of legislation would be out of the way; or because it expected currency inflation; or, quite as possibly, because of some other reason unconnected with the bill. But what of the real outlook?

Of the effect of the new law in at least one direction, there is no doubt whatever. That it will altogether abolish financial panic is not in the least to be expected. Human nature, excesses of speculation, and abuse of credit would have to be abolished first. But the precise phenomena of 1907—the grasping by each of our 25,000 banks at the other's reserves; their suspension of cash payments because of the hoarding of currency; and, finally, the open market premium on all kinds of currency and the issue of emergency paper money—would not be possible.

In a similar panic outbreak, under the new system, every individual bank in each of the four or eight banking districts would at once apply to its regional central bank for the necessary currency. To get this currency, in whatever sum it needed, it would tender its own commercial paper holdings to the regional bank, which would rediscount such offerings, open a book credit against them, and allow the individual bank, on the basis of that credit, to obtain and pay out notes issued at once through the regional central bank.

The next point of interest would be, just how the system probably would work in the autumn "harvest demand." We should no longer have the mountain of re-deposited country bank reserves in Chicago and New York, against which interior banks draw cash by the tens of millions, with the familiar resultant loan contraction. The country bank would tender its merchants' paper for rediscount at its regional institution, and thereby establish an enlarged reserve. It could then expand its loans. When it came to getting the requisite supplies of currency for paying the farm-hands and providing the till-money of country stores in the active season, it would draw, as against that credit, either the present small notes of Government currency or the new reserve notes.

When the farm-hands have been paid off, and both the "autumn re-stocking" and the "holiday trade" completed, five to ten millions in currency per week will come back, under the present system, to the New York banks from the interior. Under the new system, a country bank, with its customers paying off their loans and its deposits swelled by return of currency from the channels of retail trade, would naturally reduce its own liabilities to its regional central bank. This it could do by sending to that central bank not only the superfluous reserve money in its vaults, but the notes similarly returned from circulation.

All this would leave two serious questions open. Under the new provisions, the reserves of the individual banks are much reduced, and a good part of the prescribed reserves may consist of the proceeds of its own commercial paper, rediscounted at a central bank. Would this mean so great facility for increasing loans, and so little of the old-time "rope to the balloon" (which the larger cash reserve requirement provided), as to encourage undue expansion, not of the currency, but of credit? This is perhaps the most difficult of all points on which to make confident prediction. It is, however, just this problem which every European central bank has had to meet, and they have met it through the raising of the official bank rate for rediscount, whenever private banks were spreading out too far.

But this very fact draws attention to the second uncertainty. Would the management of our regional banks be quick to adopt such policy, if they saw that the member institutions were encouraging undue speculation? Our great city bankers have not been in all respects noted in the past for the pursuance of a money-market policy which was based on putting up discount rates with the open purpose of checking and obstructing a speculative movement, based on expanded credit. Still, with the new banking system will come new responsibilities, and a bank directorate which deals with banks alone is something different from one which deals with powerful individuals.
